PRELIMINARY ESSAY.

SECTION I.

PROFESSORS of the sciences, more especially Geometricians and Algebraists, commence their respective courses of instruction with definitions, postulates, and axioms, so perspicuous and comprehensible, as not infrequently to allure the sanguine disciple into a hope that the difficulties with which " the indiligence of an idle tongue"* may have threatened him, will prove less real than imaginary. There is one great and manifest advantage in the pursuit of the Mathematics, that the simple principles thus proposed at the outset have an obvious relation to their subject. In various other branches of knowledge this is far from being the case, and it is sometimes necessary to lay down, with the imposing appearance of formal dialecticks, truths so evidently true, and yet at first glance so far removed from the thesis of discourse, that not their importance only but even their relevancy may be very fairly suspected. These observations do not seem impertinent or imprudent from a writer who may feel it advisable to use some precaution, lest he should startle his readers by roundly asserting, as an axiom upon which he means to ground his grammatical speculations, that man, as well as other animals, is born with five senses;

> And though things sensible be numberless,
> But only five the sense's organs be;
> And in those five all things their forms express,
> Which we can touch, taste, feel, or hear, or see.
> Davies, Immortality of the Soul.

At the banquets, it will be remembered, in which the Athenians indulged during the festivals observed in honour of the Muses, it was the custom for men of learning to propose questions one to another. In the ninth book of the Symposiacs of Plutarch, which records a number of these banquet discourses, Hermeias, the Geometrician, who is the first to speak, demands of Protogenes, the Grammarian, why Alpha was ranked the first of all the letters? δί ην Ἄλφα προτατεται των γραμματων απαντων. The reason assigned by Protogenes amounts to this, that A will not act in concord with any of his brethren, unless he has the lead; thus place him before I, and he consents to a combined diphthongal sound—A I; place him after, and he refuses to coalesce with his preferred associate—I A.

Cadmus, it seems, had long before pronounced, that to A had been awarded this right of precedence, because, in the language of the Phœnicians, an ox, the first of things necessary to man, was known by the name of A. The recollection of this induces Ammonius to call upon Plutarch himself, as a Bœotian born, to step forward in defence of his countryman Cadmus. "Not so," quoth Plutarch; "for it is but just that I should raise my voice—not in defence of the grandfather of Bacchus, but rather of my own. And he used to say that, "naturally the first articulate vocal sound was produced by the power of A: Πρώτην φύσει φωνην των ενάρθων εκφέρεσθαι διά της του Ἄλφα δυναμεως: that it is the simple utterance or emission of the breath, through the opened lips, without effort, and without the aid of the tongue; and further, that it is the very first vocal sound uttered by infants; and thus," he adds, "αι-ειν, is to perceive or receive the sensation of sound (au-d-ire)."

The conversation is then directed to the reasons there may be for the number of letters, and to the proportions that subsist between the one sort and the other. Answers are without hesitation returned to solve the two problems; to the first by Plutarch, and to the second by Hermeias. There is, however, present one Zopyrio, also a grammarian, who could scarcely suppress his splenetic contempt, until silence presented an opportunity to be heard. He then derided their philosophy as vain babble, and confidently assured them, that as the number and the order of the letters were, so they were, not for any reason, but by chance, μηδενι λογω συντυχια δε.

I wish to introduce these learned, inquisitive, and talkative Symposiasts, together with the recondite subjects of their discourse, to the notice and regard of modern philosophic banquetteers, in hopes that they may be inspirited to emulate their antique masters, and to allow the origin and formation of language, to be introduced and entertained with due attentions at their boards. And if any Zopyrio should scoffingly reject a natural origin for articulate intelligible sounds, and dogmatically ascribe them to a certain Συντυχια, or Chance, let me warn them to pause awhile, before they invest him with authority to pronounce his own ignorant assumption, as the conclusion in which all without enquiry have agreed to acquiesce.

It is, indeed, exceedingly difficult, if not wholly impossible, so far to divest ourselves of acquired knowledge, as to enable us to contemplate man in his purely infant state—the state referred to by the ancestor of Plutarch—to consider him as a creature merely endowed with the faculty of receiving sensations, and with organs for the articulation of distinct sounds; with a native power to reveal to himself that, in the exercise of these organs, he is possessed of the ready means to signify or communicate those sensations to other individuals of his kind. It is, nevertheless, incumbent upon the enquirer into the origin and formation of language, to make a strong effort to struggle at least with this formidable difficulty, if not wholly to subdue it.

It is a trite remark, that the invention and practice of oral speech, must have long preceded the invention and formation of literal characters: that words, the signa audibilia, must have prevailed on the surface of the earth for years and centuries of years before the graphic signs, the verba visibilia, could have been contrived.

Warburton, whose daring spirit plunged him into the darkness of the most early ages, persuaded himself that he had discovered the origin and traced the progress of symbolic figures, and that he had brought the general history of writing, by a gradual and easy descent, from a picture to a letter.

Of the inventors of those letters which have been transmitted to us in the Greek alphabet, history* has been ambitious to preserve the names as she received them from tradition; and the invention itself has ever been commemorated as the noblest monument of human intelligence. "It is a thing (says Bishop Wilkins†) of so great art and exquisiteness, that Tully doth from hence infer the divinity and spirituality of the human soul, and that it must needs be of a far more excellent and abstracted essence than mere matter or body, in that it was able to reduce all articulate sounds to twenty-four letters."‡ "Aut is concretus videtur? . . . qui sonos vocis, qui infiniti videbantur, paucis literarum notis terminavit?" Such is the language of Cicero himself. Tusc. Quæst. l. i. c. 25.

The learned and sagacious Wallis describes a letter to be "a sound in the voice, simple or uncompounded, and indivisible into more simple sounds."§ In this he approaches as near to the truth as any of those grammarians, whose opinions have been collected by the diligence of

* Plin. Nat. Hist. l. vii. c. 56. † Real Character, b. i. c. 3.

‡ Hobbes, no slight authority, asserts, that the invention of printing, though ingenious, compared with the invention of letters, is no great matter.—Of Man, c. 4.

§ Sonus in voce, simplex, seu incompositus, in simpliciores indivisibilis. De Loquela, sec. 1.—He agrees, however, that it may be called, not the sound itself, but a character indicating or designating the simple sound—soni simplicis indicem. Of course it is so, when written; but the sound must have long been in settled usage.

Vossius,* excepting, and a singular exception it is to be so neglected and forgotten,—excepting—Aristotle. He has pierced more deeply, and he has defined a letter to be "an indivisible sound, and yet (he adds) not all such sounds are letters, but those only that are capable of forming an intelligible sound."† It is by this last epithet, συνετη φωνη, that we distinguish the preeminence of the ancient above the modern philosopher; for to the title of philosopher our countryman must still preserve an undoubted claim.

Wallis has remarked that our language greatly delights in monosyllables,‡ and with more subtilty than solidity, in the opinion of Dr. Johnson,§ that "in our native words a great consent of letters and the thing signified, may very frequently be observed:" Magnum utplurimum literarum reique significatæ consensum reperiri.‖ His instances, however, are all of letters conjoined; that is, of separate parts, to which individually he attaches no signification, into significant wholes. Had he weighed with greater accuracy the terminology of Aristotle; had he recognised the force and comprehended the full and exact value and propriety of the expression, "an intelligible sound," that is, a sound significant of an intelligible meaning; it is not improbable that, with his extensive and profound erudition, and his very superior powers of understanding, he would have been the founder of a system of Etymology so perfect, that no other task would have been left to his successors than to consolidate and extend it.

"Horne Tooke's (says Sir James Mackintosh¶) is certainly a wonderful work; but the great merit is the original thought." What was this thought so highly prized, by one so able to appreciate its worth?

That words are the signs of ideas (συμβολα παθηματων), and that all are nouns, significant (*και σημαινει τι) are positions that had long been acknowledged in the schools, and taught there upon the express authority of Aristotle. As an undeniable consequence Tooke inferred that those classes of words, comprised under the general name of particles, were also nouns, and had of course a signification. And the thought was, that there must be in the original language, from which those particles were derived, literally such and such words, bearing such and such significations. This conclusion, the result of general reasoning, he subjected to the test of etymology, and he instantly found upon trial all his predictions verified.††

 Arist. de Inter. ch. i. and ch. iii. †† Div. of P. v. i. ch. vii.

The deepest and the broadest principle of H. Tooke is, that all words are nouns, and that all nouns are the signs of ideas; here he descried, and here he warily preserved the main spring of his theory of language. He does not intermeddle with the letters, "those simple elements of speech," as Wilkins justly denominates them,—his purpose did not require that he should. But the renowned Savilian professor treats most distinctly and copiously, as well as acutely of them; and yet, in his attempt to explain what a letter is, he omits that specific term upon which Aristotle had so strongly insisted, as indispensable to the correctness and completeness of the definition.

What then am I venturing to propose, that has not been taught by these two illustrious writers?

Under the sanction of the still more renowned and illustrious Stagyrite, I venture, with no assumption of unfelt diffidence, to lay before the philologers and philosophers of the æra in which I write, certain opinions that have arisen and become established within my own mind, and to state with all possible simplicity and precision the train of general reasoning by which I was led to the belief, that these opinions rest upon a basis not less firm and unchangeable than that of our own physical nature. Having so done, I shall proceed with the practical application of the thought, which immediately presented itself, that if I were to follow the example of Horne Tooke, and subject my principles to the test of that etymology from which he reaped so brilliant a recompense, my experiment might be crowned with similar, if not with equal, success.

My general reasoning then has been this:—All men of all ages and countries of the world have had, and have, the same organs of speech,* and the same sense of hearing; that is, the same organs for the utterance and entrance of sound, with the faculty of distinguishing one sound from another.

Distinct, articulate or organic sounds,—constituting oral language, were and are, as Aristotle terms them, intelligible sounds, or sounds intended to signify distinct meanings.

All people, to whom written language is known, have written signs (named letters) to denote the same distinct intelligible sounds, so constituting oral language; for each sound a corresponding literal sign.

Each letter then was the sign of a separate distinct meaning; it was in fact the sign of a word, previously familiar in speech.

* Literas proferendi, et universam quidem loquelam perficiendi instrumenta sunt præcipua, pulmo et larynx (i. e. nodus gutturis) cum adjacente aspera arteria; item lingua, nares, labia, variæque oris partes.—Wallis, De Loquela, s. l. To which add,—Vocum articulatio, sive diversarum literarum formatio, tunc incipit, postquam spiritus extra laryngem pervenit; et, naribus, ore, lingua, labiis, fere tota perficitur.—Id. ib.

These letters, once invented, and their forms established, were, and continue to be, distinguished by the two general names of vowels and consonants.

The vowels, or letters so named, are the signs of a breathing; these breathings, however, are emitted by sentient beings, they are the proofs of animal vitality or life, and they have given birth to some primitives denoting sensation, and also motion,—the first act of a sentient being; E. g.

A.—Gr. a-ειν, ha-lare, to breathe. A. S. O-r-ath, aὺ-ra, breath, *a*ir. Lat. a-i-o. I say. A.S. Aa. Eng. Ay. Gr. a-ει.* Gr. αι-ειν, au-d-ire, Ου-ας, au-ris. Goth. Au-so, the ear.

E. and I.—Gr. ε-ω, ει-μι, Lat. e-o, Gr. ι-ε-ναι. Lat. i-re. A.S. Hi-gan, to hie, to go.

The consonants are those letters (saysWilkins†) in pronouncing of which the breath is intercepted by some collision, or closure, among the instruments of speech. Vossius thinks them so called, quod junctæ vocalibus sonum‡ edunt. The object of the ensuing pages does not exact an attention to the distribution of these letters into kinds, such as liquids or semi-vowels, and mutes; it will be quite sufficient to remark, that in naming the former, the vowel is, by established usage, preposed, and in naming the latter it is subjoined,§ and that either usage might without impropriety have been extended to all. Their common nature will be more clearly understood by observing, that each consonant letter requires, for its complete utterance, a breathing precedent, a closure or collision of some of the organs of speech, and an aperture or separation of them, with a breathing subsequent.

Take, for instance, the labials B and M.

Call the first (with the vowel preposed, áb, éb, ám, ém‖) the announced sound;

Call the second (with the vowel subjoined, bà, bè, mà, mè) the enounced sound;

And to the two we may give the name of conunciate,—ábbà.

The announced sound of the letter B (áb) signified a meaning; so did the enounced (bè); and so did the conunciate utterance of the two, ábbà.

The literal character B, was and is the written sign of this meaning; the literal sound is a word; the literal character is the written sign of that word. What is predicated of B, may be so of all the other consonants.

‖ All the vowels may be both preposed and subjoined;—and Scheide—Ceterum stirpi αγ-ω, cognatæ sunt εγ-ω, ιγ ω, ογ-ω, υγ-ω.

The first question then is, Will etymology enable us to discover, in any and what languages, words corresponding to these sounds of B. κ, τ, λ..?

As all written words consist of letters, it is an undeniable corollary from the preceding premises, that all written words are formed of the written signs of spoken sounds; each sound having its own distinct meaning; and each written letter being the sign of that meaning; of whatever numerical series of such written signs any word may be connected or composed.

The second question then is, Will Etymology enable us to discover in any and what languages, words of more than one letter, bearing evidence in the force of their signification that they have been so composed?

To these questions I return this answer.

I think it possible,

1. To present words,—not from one language only—corresponding to the simple sounds of every consonant letter.

2. To shew, that these words, used in the position of prefixes and suffixes, retain the meaning which they possess when used alone.

3. To shew, that these letters or literal words, interposed among other letters, do (in the instances produced) still manifestly retain the same meaning; and I may then assume the courage to affirm it to be an inference of sound reason that, though cases of interposed letters may be rapidly collected, in which it will be vain to attempt an explanation, yet that these letters, these literal roots, were interposed in their original meaning, or else by analogy, from other words that had been previously so constructed.

It is not probable that evidence to particular cases, should be carried very far among the complexity of words, consisting of many letters. Corruption will commence with the very elements; it will act with all the powers of variation and combination, as soon as the work of compounding is begun; and the means of decomposing into the simple parts will soon elude the eye of the most vigilant sagacity. "But a theory (says Burke) founded on experiment and not assumed, is always good for so much as it explains. Our inability to push it indefinitely is no argument at all against it." *

* Of the Sublime and Beautiful. Pref.

SECTION II.

Let us proceed with the labials 'B' and 'M.'

The announced sound of the letter B is produced, when the closure of the lips intercepts the utterance of the breath (áb). And the enounced, when the utterance is continued after the aperture of the lips (bà). They are both heard in Abba. The same with the cognate letters P (áppà)—F (áf-fà) V (áv và).

The organic sounds of these letters will be recognized as the earliest distinct sounds spoken by children; and the direct inference is, that, from the constant repetition of speech, they become reciprocated as names for both parent and child.

'B.*—In Heb. Ab; in Arabic and Gothic, the conunciate Aba, in Heb. and other tongues Abba, are names of the male parent; and in some it may be added here, Am, em or emm ('M) is the name for the female parent.

But B' is, in union with its cognates, in different languages a far more fruitful source; thus, applied to the parent;—

B.—Persian, Ba-ba. Arabic, Ba-aba. Sanscrit, Bop.

P.—Per. Pa-der. Sans. Pa-tera. Gr. Πα-πας, Πα-τηρ. Lat. Pa-ter. Eng. Pa-pa (with the Hottentots Bo, and in some American Islands Ba-ba. Watcher, Pref. § 6).

F.—Goth. Fa-drein, pa-rentes. A.S. Fæ-der. Sw. Fa-dder. Dan. Fa-der. Eng. Fa-ther; and Chinese Fou.

V.—Dutch, Va-der. Ger. Va-ter.

It is worthy of remark, that the Persian and Arabic, together with the American Islands, referred to by Wachter, apply to the parent that organic sound of B reduplicated, which in so many other languages is applied to the child; thus,

B.—The Heb. Ba-bah, Syriac Ba-ba, are our English Babe.

The Pers. Buch. Sw. Bagge. Dan. Pog, are our Eng. Boy. And the Gr. Βαι-ος, is pa-rvus.

P.—In Gr. Πα-ις. Lat. Pu-pus, pu-er, pu-pa, pu-ella.

The food of infants, and the source whence it flows, have names of the same sound, Bub, Lat. Ub-er, pap (also Ma-ma).

* To avoid the formal repetition of announced, enounced;—these marks ' ' will in future be used.

M.—The letter M is the natural sound of lowing (mugitus) when the lips are shut and the sound proceeds from the nose; the announced sound is produced, while the lips are closed; the enounced, after they are opened.

From M', applied to the parent, there are: Ar. and Heb. Mam. Pers. Mam. Ma-dur. San. Ma-ta, ma-tri. Hind. Ma-ttara. Gr. Μα-μμα, μα-τηρ.* Lat. Ma-mma, ma-ter. A.S. Me-der, mo-der. Dan. and Sw. Mo-der. D. Moe-der, moe-r. Ger. Mù-tter. Eng. Ma-ma, Mo-ther (and with the Egyptians Μουθ.)†

In A.S. Mæ-g, Ma-go, is both pa-rens, and pu-er, pu-ella. In Goth. Ma-gath. A.S. Mæ-gth. Ger. Ma-gd. Dutch, Maa-gt. Dan. Moe. Sw. Moe. Isl. May, mey, is the English Ma-id, formerly (as in the A.S. also) written Mai. The Sanscrit has Moo-gdha, Ma-djaina; and the Pers. Made, mad-eh mad-een.

I do not affect to be original or even singular, in ascribing a common origin to the great majority of these words; but I am certainly not aware that I have been anticipated in fixing upon the stirps of the whole progeny. I say of the whole progeny; for, with regard to part of it, the parental names, the very learned Wachter, whose German Glossary is a mine of inestimable value to the Etymologer, has long preceded me.

It is worthy of observation, he tells us, "Quod primi conatus puerorum utendi voce sint literæ labiales."‡ Hence, he adds, we may believe, "Ap, pap, em, mem, quæ sunt infantilis linguæ prima rudimenta, et naturalia lallantium puerorum blandimenta, esse voces secreto naturæ instinctu prolatas, vel potius ab ipsa natura in puerorum labiis formatas, et postea, a parentibus, ut par erat, in omnibus fere linguis, etiam antiquissimis adoptatas." He then produces from different languages the different synonyms for father and mother, but he does not here or elsewhere appear to have suspected any of these naturalia blandimenta to have been applied for names to the child, as well as adopted by the parents for names of themselves.§

Thus much then, though shortly, yet seems to be clearly established, that the organic sounds of B with its cognates, and M, were primarily appropriated as names for both parent and child. Various syllabic terminations, as we now denominate them, have in various tongues been affixed, the meaning of which it is the province of Etymology to ascertain

* The Greek etymologists derive Πα-τηρ, and Μα-τηρ, from the third person singular, Πε-πα-ται, με-μα-ται, of the pret. per. pass. of the verbs πα-σειν, alere, pascere; μα-σειν, am-are.

† The learned reader may see this pursued through various other languages in "Tableaux Synoptiques de Mots Similaires." Par H. A. Le Pileur.

‡ Prefatio ad Germanos, § 6. See also his Gloss. in V. Mutter.

§ The Lat. Pa-ter, he supposes to be pa-pa-ter, for ter he considers to be a mere termination, and rather a deformity than an ornament. And I must not omit to add, that he asserts all letters, vowels, diphthongs, consonants, to signify something, in all languages; thus he says A in A.S. is semper; I in English is Ego; Be in English is Sum, &c.

So far as to the origin of these reciprocated names; nouns and pronouns.

We have also a word found, generally, in Eastern and Northern languages, and of which Etymologists have not yet attempted to trace the origin, the pronoun Me, which may have, rather must have, derived its reference and appropriation to the individual speaking, from the persevering, reiterated, cry of the speaker to enforce attention to its wants.

Me.—The Pronoun, in Sans. Me, ma. Hind. Mu-gh: but in Persian, Am. Gr. με, εμε. Goth. Mi-c. Ger. Mi-ch. Dutch, Mij. Dan. and Swed. Mi-g. And hence, it may be inferred (though by anticipation), that the first person of the Gr. and Sans. Verb, in Μι, is formed by affixing this pronoun ma, me, or mi.

We must proceed to the consideration of an assemblage of words, which, although they appear to stand at a little remove from these literal roots, or radical nouns, yet receive their signification immediately from them.

'B,—Is expressed in the Lat. Prep. Ab,—in the Twelve Tables written Af; its cognates in the Gr. απ-ο, αφ,* επ-ι, οπ-η, υπ-ερ. In the Danish, Dutch, Swedish, and also Gothic, Af. A.S. Of. Ger. Ab. Lat. ib-i, ob, ub-i.

In Persian, Ab, is source;† and the Lat. preposition ab, and the corresponding English be, bi, or by are apposed, and thus denote or refer to that, being or biding (bi) which any thing also has been; from which any thing receives or derives its beginning or origin, has its rise, its source, its spring, its cause: to that point, being or biding which, whence or from which, where or when, motion or action, or sensation, begins or commences.

Ab first appears in verbal composition in the A.S. Ebb-an.‡ Ger. Ab-en. D. Ebb-en, to ebb; also Dutch (Vetus et obsoletum), Av-en. Gr. αφιεσθαι. Lat. Ab-ire.

It then appears in the Goth. Ab-al, which is the Gr. Β-ια; Lat. V-is (ab-ility) power.

The Goth. and A.S. Hab-ban, was also used as equivalent to some of the tenses of the Verb To be.

B'. and its cognates.—In A.S. Be-on. Sans. Bhu. Pers. Bu-d-en. Russian, Bu-it. Eng. o be. Welsh, Byw or Vyw. Erse, Beo.

The Ar. Per. and Goth. Bi, the A.S. Be, bi, Ger. Bei. Dan. By. Eng. By; variously written like the A.S. Be, bi, or by.

Then in the A.S. By-an, (bi-d-an, bi-ed-an) to bi-de, to continue to be, to dwell. (Dan. Bye, a dwelling.*)

F.—Gr. Φυ-ειν. Lat. fi-eri, pa-rere, to be, to be-ar, (Lat. fuo).

Gr. Φα-ειν Lat. fa-ri. A. S. Fa-r-an, to fa-re, to utter, to go or move forth, to be far.

V.—These abound in the Latin: Va-dere, Va-lere, Vi-dere, ve-lle, va-gire, Va-tes, Vi-r, Vi-s, Vi-ta, vi-a, va-por.....

'M.—Our English Am, is found in the Gr. ειμ-ι. San. Am, asmi. Per. Am. oum. Goth. Im, originally (Grimm asserts) is-um or esum. A. S. Eom. Lat. S-um, esum, (the s must hereafter be accounted for). The Goth. had also the simple breathing A, and Gr. α-ειν, to breathe, αι-ειν, to hear.

Am, then appears in the Lat. Am-are, equivalent to the Gr. μα-ειν, whence αμα, sim-ul, Lennep supposes a Gr. primitive αμ-ω.

The Gr. ι-μ-ι, is also ire, to go, and A. S. Hæ-m-ian† is co-i-re, to go or be together (αμα).

Ger. me-y-nen. Sw. Me-na. Dan. Mee-n-er, to me-an, to mi-nd. Arab. Mu-une. Hind. Ma-na, to signify, to indicate. San. Mu-n Goth. Mo-d. Gr. με-νος. Lat. Me-ns. Eng. Mi-nd.

But this literal root, (am or ma) was not restricted to the first person, me. Its conunciate (I may venture to call it) the Goth. Imma, was applied to the third, him: and in the Latin, Hom-o, m-an, there is no appropriation to grammatical distinction at all. We shall find, too, hereafter, the same syllabic, or literal, elements in pronouns of the second person.

Here then we have a series of words, formed from or upon two "indivisible intelligible sounds;" and which stand at so short a remove from their origin, and bear along with them evidence so clear of an unbroken, lineal connexion, as to admit no doubt of the genuine legitimacy of their descent.

They denote sensation; motion; life; the source, the cause, the continuance, the active power or energy of life, or living beings, bodily and mental: and also the utterance of sensation by "indivisible intelligible sounds." And it may be reasonably inferred that, pursuing the investigation further into the formation of language, a numerous race of words, issuing severally from each and every of these denotations of meaning, would, with little difficulty, be discovered.

These sounds, Blandimenta naturalia, the labials B and M, seem to me to be so manifestly the natural productions of our physical organs; to have a primitive meaning so obvious and intelligible; to pervade the tongues of so many countries, and to have obtained so generally, if not universally, an application immediately springing from this meaning; that I am encouraged to advance an hypothesis for the origin of all other organic sounds; viz. that they derived their meaning also from natural causes, though I must confess my inability to propose them.

Upon comparing the cognates C, G (pronounced κε, γε), the cognates D. T. and N. it will, I think, be found that they have one common denotation of encrease: though of encrease effected by different modes:—

N.—By the *un*ion of separate magnitudes into one: and thus encreasing the solidity or solid bulk or dimensions. In A.S. An-an, is rendered by Lye, dare, concedere: it means, to one, to *un*ite, to join, and, thus, to give.

C.—By ek-ing, or extending one magnitude over a longer or a broader space, or both, and thus encreasing the superficial dimensions. In Goth. Auk-an, to eke,

D.—By add-ing, one magnitude to another, and thus encreasing the number of integers or integral parts. A. S. Ad, aad, congeries.

The Editor of Lennep, "Everard Scheide," whose absurdities, says Dr. Bloomfield,* "are only matched by the senseless trifling of the ancient Etymologists," ascribes to εν, the signification of immixtio, insertio: if he had superadded conjunctio, he would have approached in terms more closely to my explanation of the A. S. An-an (to one).

Lennep (whose notions, the same learned prelate affirms, are often very fanciful), asserts, that the peculiar meaning of the Gr. αγ-ων, is to be sought, in motu rei impulsæ, et ita motæ ex uno loco in alium,—and that hence descend the significations, ducendi .... trahendi .... and more remotely, ducendi in longum; and thus he arrives at the meaning, which I have ascribed to the Goth. Auk-an (to eke).

The same Lennep asserts, that the peculiar meaning of the Gr. αδ-ων is to be sought, in motu, qui fit res plures in unum coagerendo et coacervando: which is precisely the same as that of the A.S. Ad, aad, congeries.

I do not mean to deny, that there are many fanciful notions in Lennep, and much trifling in Scheide; but I do deny that there is any thing either fanciful or trifling in the instances above quoted; and I have no hesitation to declare that I am always rejoiced, when I can support any hypothesis or conclusion of my own by the authority of men so deservedly eminent for their ability and learning.

"Much light," the Bishop acknowledges, "was thrown upon the structure and origin of the (Greek) language by the sagacity and erudition of Hemsterhuys, who supposed that the primary verbs consisted of two or three letters, from which all the other forms and inflections were derived." Hemsterhuys himself never explained his theory in any distinct work The fullest exposition of it is to be found in the Observationes of Valcknaer, and the Analogia of Lennep.

Valcknaer, a name not very familiar to the ear of an English reader, but held in proper reverence among the Illustrissimi in Grecian literature, supposes, that by following the footsteps of Hemsterhuys and Schuyltens,† he has found the road which leads to the discovery of Greek roots (ad origines Græcas detegendas), to restore some primitives that have almost escaped; and to determine the peculiar signification of words, as distinguished from their figurate and metaphorical.

The leading propositions of the elementary portion, or the rudiments o. this theory, are these:

1. That in Gr. there are five, and no more, biliteral primitives, αω, εω, ιω, οω, υω.

* Pref. to the Trans. of Matthias' Greek Grammar.

† Schuyltens applied the theory of Hemsterhuys to the Hebrew.

2. That there are twelve, and no more, primitive verbs beginning with α; αβω, αγω, αδω, ακω, αλω, αμω, ανω, απω, αρω, ασω, ατω, and ἄω, viz. One biliteral, the last mentioned, αω, and eleven triliterals, formed by the interposition of each consonant between α and ω.

Valcknaer remarks, that there are other of these triliteral primitives beginning with other vowels, and he produces as specimens ἴδω, ἷδω, whence the Latin Edo and Sedeo; and also, beginning with consonants,

δ	α ε ι ο υ	ω
π		ω
τ		ω

It is manifest: 1. that the biliterals of this system are not indivisible sounds; that the addition of ω to each vowel constitutes so many compounds.

2. That the triliterals are formed of the announced sound of each of the eleven consonants, followed by ω, itself a corruption of the gutteral εγ or ογ, commonly called the pronoun of the first person. So much for Valcknaer.

Lennep devotes the second chapter of his Analogia to the Letters of the Alphabet; he professes himself to be convinced, that unless the separate parts of words, or the elements of which they are composed, and their nature, be rightly understood, it will be impossible to judge of words themselves and their formation: he enters into a brief historical survey of the gradual completion of the Greek alphabet, the classification and power of the different letters; he is perfectly assured that, from the earliest times, men must have been sensible that the whole copiousness of language consisted of very few, and those elementary sounds, and that these sounds might be and were designated by certain peculiar characters, which afterwards obtained the name of letters. But he throws not out the slightest intimation that he apprehended those elementary sounds, of which letters were the signs, to have any meaning in themselves.

I have considered it to be no more than sheer justice to myself, to say thus much of the doctrines of Hemsterhuys and his disciples, because the terms in which the principle tenet of their doctrine is expressed by the Bishop of London, might induce a supposition that there subsisted some strong points of resemblance between the German theory and my own. To resume:—

The distinction which I have stated to have been originally observed in the respective usages of C, D, and N, may perhaps, upon the first presentment, wear the aspect of a spirit of discrimination too recondite and refined for rude and unlettered ignorance. But we must not direct our attention to the formal technicality of the phrases by which the fact is in each instance described, but to the plain and palpable simplicity of the fact itself. The increase of solidity or solid dimension, by union of body with body; and that of superficial dimension by extension; and that of number by the apposition of units or collections of units,—are so obviously dissimilar to sense, and of so common and necessary occurrence in reality, that they would be among the easiest and earliest essential accidents which language would be required to distinguish. Why, however, these different organic sounds should each be so peculiarly appropriated, I am not prepared to hazard a conjecture. Of the letters or literal roots B and M, and their primitive intrinsic meaning, a very succinct, I submit, and satisfactory interpretation, and illustration also, have been given. But with regard to the other consonant letters or literal roots, all that can be done, or rather all that I indulge the hope to do, as I have already intimated, is this: to find for each "an indivisible intelligible sound," and that sound a word; to examine carefully, and settle clearly, the radical meaning of that word, and to exhibit some portion of its progress in the construction or formation of speech.

It is scarcely to be expected that any great advance will be effected before confusion will cross our path, and embarrass our procedure. The leading notion of encrease may, in a multitude of terms, still be kept in immediate view; but the specific difference will be found to have been more speedily disregarded; and as new combinations and new complexities arose, in which the notion of encrease would become equalized or subordinate in relation to other notions comprehended within the composite term, all attention to the primitive propriety would be entirely forgotten.

C. G.—The announced sound of the cognates C. and G (κε and γε) is produced, when the breath, in its utterance, is intercepted towards the throat by the middle or root of the tongue, —as, âc, ág, éc, ég; and the enounced, when the utterance is continued after the tongue is withdrawn, as, cà, gà, κε, γε.

'C. and 'G. — The Goth. Auk-an. A. S. Ec, eac, ic, or yc-an. Ger. Auch-en. Dutch, Oeck-en. Sw. Och-a. Dan. Og-er, are evidently the same word, (differently pronounced, written, and applied;) as the Gr. αγ-ειν,* ακ-η, οξ-υς. Lat. Ag-ere, aug-ere, ac-uere; they have the same radical or intrinsic meaning, expressed by the common English verb, to ich, now written to eke, and have the same literal root.

In Lat. Aug-ere, the application is to number, as well as to quantity; and thus the usage is become more general, trespassing upon the province of ad-dere.

In. Lat. Ac-uere, Gr. οξ-υς, the application is consequential: by protracting lineally, by extending superficially, and thus drawing or producing to a point or edge (A. S. Ec-ge) a Goth. Ak. A. S. Ac. Old English. Ac, is equivalent to eke, add, and; the Gr. και, γα, γε.

Gr. preposition Εκ, εξ. Lat. Ex.

Of the Sanscrit pronoun. Ah-am, Bopp has observed,—

1. That it consists of two elements, ah, and am;
2. That it has no connection with its oblique cases; and,
3. That ah is the root, and am a mere termination.†

With all my deference for so renowned an oriental scholar as Bopp, and for so sensible and reflecting an enquirer as Dr. Prichard, I can admit the first observation, and that alone, to be correct.

1. A-ham certainly does consist of two elements, and they are G (γ) and M:—both announced,—Ag, Am, the guttural G. being softened into the aspirate H.

2. The accusative case of this Sanscrit pronoun is Màm, which is composed of M. both enounced (mà), and also announced (ám). It consequently contains the second element M in all its power; though degraded by Bopp to a mere termination. Mà (i. e. m enounced) is also used alone, as the accusative.

3. M is found in all the cases (except two) in the three numbers singular, dual, and plural, which the Sanscrit Grammar usurps in common with the Greek, and it is the same literal root M; or element in the nomenclature of Dr. Prichard.

This Sanscrit Nominative Ag-am (pronounced Ah-am) has, in fact, the duplicate force of I and Me. The Sanscrit Accusative Ma-am (pronounced Mám) has the force of the reduplicated Me-Me. The first obviously subsists in the Lat. Ego-me-t (εγο με δε‡) and has its equivalent in the common English expression—And me too. The second subsists in the Lat. Me-me-t, (με με δε), and in the common English repetition—*me-me.

There are a few words, so very different in their application, which have sprung immediately from this literal root (g or c), that I cannot resist the temptation to name them now.

* I am well aware that Tooke has ascribed a different origin to ad and at; he considers them, as I do, to have a meaning similar to that of to; and as to is, in his opinion, the past part. of the Goth. verb, Tau-yan, to do: so, he thinks, ad and at are the past part. of the Latin verb, ag-ere, to act, with the omission of the final um; thus ag-itum (g hard), ag-tum, ag-dum, agd, ad: and, actum, act, at. Thus, in chap. ix. on Prepositions; but in chap. viii. on Conjunctions, he has already given another genealogy for at; thus, adsit, adst, ast, at. There is gross inconsistency in this: he in one instance derives ad and at from the same verb; he then assumes the existence of ad, uses it as a prefix to Sit; and presents a distinct derivation of at, though elsewhere established (by him) to be the same word as this prefix ad.

Hoogeven has observed, and Tooke was fully aware of it, for he quotes his words, "Particulas in sua infantia fuisse vel verba, vel nomina," and as we have found the noun Ad in the A. S., with such a meaning as will fully account for all its usages as a particle, there appears no necessity to pursue the enquiry further. Tooke himself has asserted, that when different languages have the same word; this circumstance, its meaning shall decide which of the two is original. "The word, he adds, is always sufficiently original for me, in that language, where its meaning, which is the cause of its application, can be found. And seeking only meaning, when I have found it, there I stop: the rest is a curiosity, whose usefulness I cannot discover." P. 2. ch. 4. And again,

"Where different languages use the same or similar particle, that language ought to be considered as its legitimate parent, in which, the true meaning of the word can be found, and where its use is as common and familiar as that of any other words and substantives." P. 1. c. 9.

These are two most valuable and important rules in conducting etymological enquiries; but I fear they are too much disregarded.

And so much for the three literal roots, which have been before classed together, as denoting three modes of encrease.*

L.—In the organic pronunciation of the sounds, of which L is the literal character, the top of the tongue, during the utterance or emission of the breath, strikes against the foremost part of the palate.

The announced and enounced sounds are distinctly heard in the Arabic Alla.

The Ger. all, is omnis, totus, and also sanus, integer; the Ger. Heil is likewise sanus, integer, and the two differ, says Wachter, in nothing but the preposed H; they correspond with the Dutch Hel, Dan. Heel, the Eng. whole and all,—totus, cunctus, omnis; and are, undoubtedly, the same word. The Ger. Heill-en, tegere, and heel-n, sanare; D. Heel-en, heyl-en; Dan. heel-er, are also the same word: in A. S. Heel-an. Goth. *Hul-j*an. Sw. Hyl-ia, tegere, to cover, Eng. to hill, or hele, or heal.†

The Ger. Al-en. Lat. Al-ere. Gr. αλ-θειν, medere. Gr. Αλια, talis hali-tus, qui vaporem tepidum adfert. A. S. Œl-an, accendere, to warm. Gr. Ηλ-ιος, the Sun. The A. S. Læ-c-nian, is also Sanare, to make whole, to re-cover, to heal, whence the old English noun Leech. The A. S. Læ-g-an, le-c-gan li-c-gan, Goth. La-g-yan, are to lay. And here we appear to reach the literal meaning: to lay, or ly, to lay on or over, consequently, to cover; and as a further consequence, sanare, integrare, to make sound, entire or whole, to recover, to heal; and hence, All, omnis or omnes; from whole or hole—substantially applied—will derive its application to the whole, numerically.‡

R.—The sound of R is produced, when during the emission or utterance of the breath a quick trepidation of the tip of the tongue is vibrated against the palate. The announced and enounced sounds are strongly heard in the common exclamation hur-rah.

S and Z cognates.—

The power of S is the natural sound of hissing. Its organic sound is produced, by an appulse of the tongue towards the upper teeth or gums, and then forcing out the breath from between the tongue and upper teeth, (Z, with a vocal sound, which makes a more dense kind of hissing, mixing with some kind of murmur). The announced and enounced sounds of S are heard in esse.

A. S. As-ec-gan, se-c-gan, to say.

The (which has supplanted the A. S. Se) and that, mean take, taken;† and to take, to se-ize, (to cheese or choose‡) is probably the meaning of this literal root S. And it may be thus explained:—

1. To take; capere, pre-hend-ere, percipere; to receive (met) by the eye or ear; by the mind, to apprehend, to se-em, to feel, to be.

2. To take, to teach, i. e. to convey our thoughts by speech, to say.

SECTION III.

It is now incumbent upon me to shew, that these literal roots, when used in the character of prefixes and suffixes, retain the meaning, which they possess, when used alone. And first of B.

It is not necessary to say more of the Lat. Preposition ab, than has been already said of it alone. As a Prefix in composition, there is no difficulty about it.

Learned men (says Scheide) have abundantly proved, that the Gr. B. (i. e. B') is prefixed to the beginning of words; and that it is also inserted or interposed in the middle. And Vossius informs us, upon the authority of Heraclides, that the Pamphylians were remarkable for so doing; it was their constant custom, and a custom, he observes, differing but little from that of the Œolians in their use of the Digamma. B', he afterwards proceeds to exhibit, changed into P. F. and Vau. Scheide also repeats, that the Gr. Π, and the aspirate Φ are used as prefixes; and B, he adds, grammarians have agreed was by the Latins expressed per V; sive per Digamma Œolicum. It is not required of me here to notice the different opinions that have been, and are still, entertained respecting the Œolic Digamma. It matters not whether it were pronounced like the Latin F. or the Latin V. or VV; they are cognate Letters: the pronunciation differs merely in the compression or non-compression of the Larynx in the utterance; but its origin, I submit to the very learned scholars, who have interested themselves in the discussion of modern times, with respect to the use of this letter, must be found where the prefix B' and its cognates are to be found, and not only its origin, but its meaning and purpose too. They are one and the same literal root.

Of the Verb Βασκαιν-ειν, fascinare, Scheide says, that it appears to have sprung from the Verb καιν-ειν, pungere, and that the syllable βα must be sought and explained from the Cretan dialect, in which βα, otherwise written βς, from βο, augments or intends† the signification:—(significationem intendit). And that such is the force of this prefix in Greek and in other languages, will, I apprehend, scarcely admit of a doubt. It effects this intention of signification, by denoting—a being, or biding, a continuous being of sensation, motion or action.

† I feel obliged to adopt this Latinism. It was not unknown to our ancestors. See the Dictionary.

Βε and Ηε are common augments to the past tenses of Greek Verbs, beginning with those letters.*

In Anglo Saxon and in English, Be is a very common prefix: so much so, and so familiarly recognized, that writers, antient and modern, adopt it at their pleasure.†

B' sometimes, says Wachter, is placed absolutely for Be, as bleiben, for be-leiben; manere; erbarmen, for er-be-armen, miscreri: B' indeed very readily and fluently unites, as its cognates also do, and as C and G do likewise, with a succeeding liquid, l or r; thus be-lock, block; be-ribe, bribe; pe-lank, plank; pe-rate, prate; fe-lank, flank; fe-rock, frock.‡ Various other instances appear in their places in the Dictionary, and the number might undoubtedly be very largely increased.

The Gr. Π or Φ, the Lat. P or F, are acknowledged prefixes in those languages; not before vowels only, but placed absolutely as Wachter expresses it, i. e. as having united in pronunciation with a succeeding liquid; and it may be proper to remark here, that they as well as the other consonants are not only recognized as prefixed, but also as inter-fixed.§

V also in the more Northern tongues unites with the letters L and R, as Vlies, fleece; Vriend, friend.

The Greek K and Γ are sometimes, says Lennep, prefixed; and when they are so, they receive from Sheide the name of Literæ serviles.‖

Lye and Wachter affirm, that Ge, is for the most part otiosa; the former adds, that it has sometimes the force of the Lat. Cum; and the latter, that it serves sometimes (aug-ere, to eke), to increase, to aug-ment, the signification; and this augmentation it appears to effect by denoting a prolongation or continuity of sensation, motion or action. In A. S. Ge,¶ is a prefix even more frequent than Be; and it, as Ce also does, unites with equal fluency and ease with the same liquids L and R; thus Ce-latch or lutch, clutch; ce-rank; crank: Ge-leam, gleam; ge-rudge, grudge.••

If we look into the Greek and Latin languages, we shall find prefixes, descended from

* It may be proper to point distinctly to the fact that the preterperfect of verbs, both in Greek and Latin, Sanscrit and Teutonic languages, are constantly formed by reduplication of the consonant letter with which those verbs begin. See Prichard, p. 145. Dr. Jamieson's Hermes Scythicus, p. 209.

the literal roots, B and its cognates, C and its cognate, appearing in a variety of instances, where Etymologists have been unable to render any satisfactory reason for them.

Thus we are told by Vossius,* that in some words H is changed into F or Ph.

Familia, ὁμηλια, Firmus, ἑρμος, Furca, ὑρχη.

Into P. Palus, ἑλος, Pubes, ἡβης.

Into V. Vestia, ἑστια, Volvo, ἑιλ-ω.

And Wallis has observed that V, the consonant, has in many cases, confessedly, taken its rise from the Œolic Digamma; thus, Vid-eo, ιδ-ω; Vis, ις; Vesp-er, εσπ-ερ; Vin-um, οιν-ος; Vent-er, εντερ-ον; Vestes, εσθης. Vossius has also taught us that H is a substitute for the Gr. χ or κ, or the Latin, C, when, in fact, the prefix is merely dropped or omitted, and the simple term remains, and is used by itself.

Gr. χειμος, i. e. χε-ιμος. Lat. Hyems.

Gr. χαλω, i. e. χε-αλω. Lat. Hal-o.

A. S. Hil-an. Lat. Cel-are, i. e. ce-il-are.

A. S. Hals. Lat. Coll-um, i. e. Ce-oll-um.

Goth. Hair-wa. Lat. Cor. Gr. Κε-αρ, καρ-δια.

Lat. Hir. Gr. χε-ιρ.†

Goth. Haur-n. Eng. Horn. Lat. C-orn-u.

A. S. Hlion-an. Eng. to lean. Gr. κ-λιν-ειν.

The Lat. Quis, is Και ις, Quod, και οτι, qualis, και ille.‡

That Δ is sometimes at the beginning of words a servile letter the word Δροσος, Lat. Ros, says Scheide, produced among others by Lennep, is a sufficient proof: and in Vossius we find some examples of T prefixed: efficere queat, Scheide continues, intensionem significationis. Tæd-eo, ab αηδ-εω; Terra, ab ερα; turgeo, ab οργω vel urgeo.

To these examples (as Scheide remarks) Lennep has merely added such as may be deduced from the oblique cases of ο and ος; but neither Lennep nor Scheide has endeavoured or attempted to resolve these examples in their component parts. Τοιος, is plainly τε οιος, τηλικος, τε ηλικος; τοτε, τε οτε; and of the oblique cases τό is τε ο, τον is τε ον.§

Of the Latin preposition ad, enough has already been said; as a prefix it requires no explanation.

* And see Dr. Prichard, p. 57.

† Hair, in hair-wa, and Hir, the hand or acting limb, are Er, with the aspirate; See Er, Heer, ante. And κε-αρ, is αρ-χη; differently applied.

‡ See Note *, p. 23.

§ See Note *, p. 23.

But the Lat. preposition De, the Gr. δι-ς demand a little consideration. The Gr. δις, and δε, which Lennep respectively renders by the Lat. Bis; and by vero, autem,—have by him the same origin assigned to them: viz. the Gr. δι-ειν, dividere, separare. Scheide adopts the opinion of Hoogeven, that δε (vero, autem) is from the V. δε-ειν, to bind. Lennep contends that, a dividendo, separando, seligendo notionem ortam esse ligandi.

It must be confessed that he does not display a very plausible traduction; And to Scheide it seems incredible that δε-ειν, δι-ειν, to divide, to separate,—can have had the same origin with δι-ειν, to bind, to join. Incredible as it may seem, our own language presents a very striking coincidence in the word Twin, which equally denotes to separate or divide one into two, and to bind or join two into one: by the one process, doubling the number: by the other doubling the quantity: it is obvious enough that the one notion does not arise from the other, but that in the apparently opposite usage, the word has the same meaning. The real literal root was δα in the obsolete δα-ειν, (whence the reduplicate δι-δο-ναι, equivalent to αδ-ειν, addere*: of which sufficient mention has been already made:) Δαι-ειν, or δι-ειν, is, dividere; i.e. to encrease the number of units by dividing one integral whole into a number of separate parts; and thus, δις,† the inseparable particle as it is called, when prefixed to words themselves signifying division, separation, or partition, intends the signification, affirms or augments the force of the meaning: encreases the division, as in dis-part, dis-sever; but when prefixed to words, that denote wholeness or entirety, it reverses or negatives the meaning: as in dis-unite, dis-compose: by dividing, separating the union or composition, encreasing the number of undivided parts, or of minuter units.

The D coalesces in pronunciation readily with r following, and the A.S. Dreos-an, to fall, is manifestly composed of de, and reos-an, ru-ere, to fall: dreman, jubilare, of de, and hrem-an, clamare: and hence, To drum.

To, the prefix in A.S. and old English, is commonly (says Tyrwhit,) augmentative.

The letters L and M afford little scope for observation.

L, says Vossius, additur in medio; and both Lennep and Scheide contend, the latter in opposition to Ruhnkenius, that λαι and λα were employed to intend the signification of words.‡

The Eng. All, equivalent to the Latin omnis, is not an uncommon prefix in English.

The Gr. αλλα is the literal root λ.

M (Vossius) additur in medio; and (Lennep) it is sometimes prefixed to Vowels,‡ as in μοσχος, μοχλος, for οσχος, ὀσχλος.§

* See p. 13.

‡ See note *, p. 23.

† See Dis in the Dictionary.

§ Scheide refers to some other words in the Analogia.

The Gr. αμα is the literal root μ.*

There are a few Latin words, in which am appears as a prefix, am-b-ire, am-plecti, and it forms the first syllable of

The Greek preposition αμφι, and the A. S. Em-be. Of these it will be proper to speak somewhat at large. "Am," says Scaliger, "tota Græca est, et apud nos non nisi in compositione. Theocritus autem seorsum posuit ἄμ μεγα. Et quemadmodum Græci usitatum additamentum φι, addidere αμφι, sicut βιηφι, sicut nos nostrum te, Ante, sicut is-te, tu-te."†

And Lennep :—The Gr. αμφι is, without doubt, composed of αμα, simul, simul atque, and φε, a termination, the nature of which appears from the pronoun σφε. This σφε is composed of se-pe, (spe, σφε,) and also appears in the Lat. Se-ip-se, si-bi. The peculiar meaning, Lennep adds, is to be sought in the word utrimque. In A. S. it is written Em-be, om-be, ym-be, consisting of the same literal roots, m,—and b, the cognate of p and f, (the Gr. φ.) The Gr. αμφι-τρεχ-ειν, circum-currere, is in A. S. Ymb-ærn-an (ærn-an, also written ren-an) to run round.

And Dr. Jamieson ‡ has remarked that the A. S. Embe-gan corresponds not only in meaning but in form, to the Gr. αμφι-βαιν-ειν, Lat. Amb-ire: and he is almost inclined to think that the Moes. G. bi, A. S. be, in em-be, point out the original form of φι in αμφι, whatever may have been the origin of the first syllable. I agree entirely with Dr. Jamieson, and hope to be able to give him some satisfaction with respect to the unknown origin of Am. I think it is no other than the Am, for which I have already endeavoured to account, subsisting in the Gr. αμ-ι, I go, and in the A. S. Hæm-ian, to home ; and this latter—Hæm,—with the addition of Be, (hæsm-be) whether prefixed or suffixed, has the same force as Ge-hæm, in Ge-hæm-ian, co-ire, to come or go together, to cause to come or go together, to bring within the same space or compass, to encompass, to surround, (amplecti). Each of the two literal roots signifies motion, and their combined force may well denote the circumferential motion of the arms until the hands meet.

The Gr. N is admitted both by Lennep and Scheide, and perhaps by Ruhnkenius also, to have been used as a prefix.* But the Gr. preposition εν, the Lat. in : our own, in, un, are this literal root 'N.

En, very variously written, en, ein, in, or un,—means one ; union, ad-union, co-union ; and hence its augmenting or affirming force in composition : but whence the negative force of in, un, Ger. ein, un, A. S. On, un.

Wachter tells us that un, prefixed to substantives, signifies—first, defect or deficiency. Second : Excess. 3. That it has the force of negation, (vim negandi). 4. That it signifies pravitatem naturæ. 5. Vitium agendo. 6. Sensum intendit,—it intends the signification. And, 7, that prefixed to adjectives, it always has—negandi vim.

Whence then this affirmative, negative, un. An attempt must be hazarded to answer the question.‡

ONE means emphatically, One; and no more.

AL-ONE, is one being all: one, severed, dissevered, parted, dis-parted, from other one or more.

To ONE is, thus; to be or cause to be al-one; to be sole, un-joined, un-united, to any other. We have then

1. ONE (variously written) collectivé unus: and hence, in composition, augmenting or affirming the force of the words to which it is prefixed.*

2. One (as variously written) separativé unus: and hence, in composition, denoting a privation or negation of the positive meaning of the word to which it is prefixed.

In A. S. this prefix is written On, "tam intensiva, (says Lye) quam privativa: et ut nostra un." Neither was the A. S. un always used privatively, as, Un-les-an, On-les-an, to un-loose; which we ought to write cn-loose. And in English authors we find such words as Un-merciless, un-remorseless, un-parched,†—in which un is clearly intended to augment the force of the word to which it is prefixed. And in K. John, un-trimmed, which has so much perplexed the Commentators, is from the A. S. On-trimman: in which On is acknowledged to be used intensivé.

In A. S. a is a common affirmative prefix: it is also in that language, and in other Northern languages a negative prefix.§ In Greek it is likewise both privativum et intensivum, and its adverse usages in all admit of the same solutions.

The Gr. ανα, Goth. An-a, and in-uh, are On: in, super.

The Gr. ανευ, Goth. in-uh, Teut. on, are sine.

This opposition is also found in N'. The Gr. Ναι, νη, Lat. Næ—is—adverbium affirmandi, and hence its augmenting force in the few Greek words to be found in Lennep.

‡ Dr. Burgess is of opinion that when In diminishes it is "of the same origin as the old word sin, which afterwards was written sine; and that this is the same as ανευ, in which the final syllable seems to be adventitious, like the e in sine. Ανευ, he continues, appears to be nothing more than the negative αν in compounds, such as ανωδυνος, &c. in which the ν is added to prevent the concurrence of two Vowels." See Essay on the Study of Antiquities, p. 67. Mr. Harris has another hypothesis. "In (and sub) diminish and lessen. *In*justus, *in*iquus, unjust, inequitable; that lies within justice and equity, that reaches not so far, that falls short of them." Hermes, b. 2. c. 3. n. f.

§ See Wachter, Prol. s. 5.

The Lat. Ne, Pers. and Sans. Na, A. S. Na, English, No, nay : is adverbium negandi.

Though I am professing to account for the monosyllabic or uniliteral prepositions only, I may be excused if I introduce the bi-literal—ante.

Goth. and A. S. And, Francis et Alamannis, Ant, signifies—contra, adversus, manifestly (says Wachter) as the Gr. αντι ; whence the Lat. ante, opposite, before. It seems more probable that αν-τι, signified generally apposition or position ad-joining ; and that it was afterwards restricted to that apposition, in which the relative position of front was intended.* The meaning of the literal roots n & t or d, will sufficiently account for their connected use ; and their consequent application is without difficulty.

Ante, says Scaliger, castrensis vox fuit, quum obsiderent oppida, dicebant se esse ante oppidum.†

Vossius considers R to be a prefix in the Lat. Rarus to the Gr. αραιος, but Lennep is of opinion that R is too difficult of pronunciation to be easily prefixed before what he calls Original Letters ; and Scheide affirms, that he has not met with any Greek words, to the radical letters of which P servilis could seem to have been so used.

The Gr. αρα ; particula syllogistica (Lennep)‡ and the Lat. Re, præverbium loquelare, or loquelaris prepositio, as Vossius calls it, are the literal root,—R.

In Northern Languages er, as it is variously written ar, er, ir, or, ur, is a common prefix. Wachter ascribes to it a multiplicity of powers equal to those, which he has bestowed upon Un. Thus, it is an adverb of order, signifying the beginning ; and, it is an adverb of order, signifying the end. Kilian pronounces it to be equivalent to the Lat. Re ; as er-maeck-en, re-ficere, to re-make.

Re, we are told, is "an inseparable particle used by the Latins, and from them borrowed by us to denote iteration or backward action."§ Here again we are met by an apparent contradiction, for it has been contended, and, it is presumed, satisfactorily so, that the literal root R means before. How is this to be reconciled with iteration or backward action?

1. To re-make, er-maeck-en, re-ficere (i. e. facere) is to make or cause a thing to be as it was before.

2. To re-build, is to build that which had been built before.

3. To re-turn ; is to turn the front, to front or face about ; and also (in continuance of motion) to turn to the place or state, in which the person or thing was before.

* See Affront in the Dictionary. † De Causis, c. 155. And see the quotation from him, p. 26.

To remake, to re-build, and to remind; imply a second making, a second building, a second minding; and, hence, the iteration or doing again, that which has been done before.

To re-turn, implies a preceding motion from: and is, by usage, employed to denote a succeeding motion to; i. e. a motion necessary to bring the moving body to the place or state in which it was before. Not dissimilar to this, is our usage of with, in composition usually explained to signify opposition or privation, as, e. g. to with-draw, to with-hold, to draw or hold back or away: but any thing drawn or held back,—is also drawn or held to—sc. the drawer or holder; and thus with, in comp. retains its meaning: sc. join: but from being prefixed to words denoting a motion from as well as to, and the former the more emphatic in intention; it has been applied in comp. with a few other words denoting no such motion from—to express opposition, as to with-go, with-say.

I again hope to be pardoned for introducing a Greek bi-literal—Παρα.

Dr. Jamieson* has written very elaborately upon this preposition, and observes, that as "this preposition has various cognates in the Gothic dialects, it is not improbable that it was formed from some word common to the Greeks and Goths." It seems, he adds, to claim as its kindred the Moes. G. Faur, faura, also written—fair; which is our English fore: And each,—the Gr. πα-ρα, and the Goth. fau-ra,—is composed of the same literal roots, b, (of which p, and f, are the cognates,) and r; and the explanation already given of be, and er, will sufficiently account for their connected use to denote motion forward: (A.S. Fa-r-an).

The Gr. and Lat. Etymologists agree, that there is no Letter which the Romans prefixed to Greek words in greater numbers than the Letter S.‡—Σ, a Latinis olim C, vulgo S.

ὑς	sus	ε	se	εξ	sex
ερπω	serpo	υπο	sub	εος	suus
αλς	sal	υπερ	super	υλη	sylva.

To which may be added, ειμ-ι—s-um.

These are all before vowels: Vossius supplies some before consonants.

γραφ-ω, scrib-o γλυφ-ω or γυλφ-ω, sculp-o.

Σκυθης, Γέτης και Γοτθος, idem est, says Salmasius;—and so also the Cimbri and Σκιμβροι.†

The Lat. Se, prepositio loquelaris, inseparabilis, is the literal root S.

Se is called also a preposition, separativa et abnegativa, in its power, and properly so if it mean, as it has been already urged that it does mean—Take—for when used separativè, it is, as dis, in which se is comprized (di-se) also is, used in apposition or preposition, with some word itself signifying se-paration or partition, and then it affirms, augments, the force of the meaning;—but when so used with words denoting wholeness or entirety;—it reverses or negatives the meaning; as to se-join, to se-gregate.

* Hermes Scythicus, b. i. c. 7.

‡ Dr. Prichard reverses the case; and gives the following with other words, from Vossius chiefly, as examples of the aspirate substituted for S.

In the Northern Languages S (absolutè,†) is a common prefix to the consonants, with which it readily unites in pronunciation; e. g. Slack, lack; slime, lime; smart, mar; snip, nip; sneeze, neeze; splash, plash;—Smite, Lat. mittere. Speed, Lat. Ped-is;—Spend, Lat. pend-ere.

Having thus disposed of the prefixes, that is, of the literal roots so used, we must now proceed to the suffixes received from the same source.

The first is ive, supplied by V the cognate of B,—which we take immediately from the Lat., and which the Latin, according to Julius Scaliger,‡ obtained from the Æolians by the insertion of their Digamma. The Greek ter. is ικος, of which it will be necessary very shortly to speak at large, and the Lat. is Ivus. But with deference to Scaliger, the Gr. ιφι, Lat. Vis, strength, power,—presents a more immediate origin for this Lat. termination.§ Activus, qui agendi habeat potestàtem: Active, who has the power of acting; who can or may act: motive, that can or may move, relative, that can or may relate or have relation.

From this source we are well provided. The terminations ac, and ic, which Tooke denominates the potential active adjective, are immediately from the Gr. ακ-ος, ι-κος: but the root is the Goth. Auc-an, A.S. Eac-an, Gr. αγ-ειν, ag-ere, aug-ere, English, to eke, to aug-ment, to increase, to strengthen. And thus Cardiac—that can or may hearten: Analytic, that can or may analyse.

Ic, ig, &c. are common augmentative suffixes to Saxon verbs; As Se-on, to see; Se-c-an, to seek; weri-an, to weary; wer-ig-ean, to weary much.

Ag, in English softened into Age, Lat. Agium, denotes something added, put to or upon, imposed, charged upon: as Pontage: a toll imposed or charged for passing over a bridge. Spelman suggests, that the Lat. Agium is from the Lat. Ag-ere; signifying in composition, i. e. as an affix: Actus. Wallis thinks we have it (the termination-age) immediately from the Lat. atio.‖ There are some Lat. words, as Vor-ago, from vor-o; vert-igo, from vert-o; which confirm the opinion that ag-ium is from ag-ere.*

Ig, a common A.S. termination, softened into y, in English, as A.S. Blood-ig, Eng. Blood-y; denotes something added or adjoined or appertaining. Wachter thinks it to be sometimes from the Ger. auch-en, A. S. ic-an, to eke; at others from the Ger. eig-en, A. S. Ag-an, to owe; at others from Ger. Aug-en, Goth. Aug-an, to appear, (to eye.) One root, the literal root g, will support all the usages.

In-g. is the ter. of our pres. part. and also of nouns. This part. was formerly written ande or and, ende or end; i. e. an-ed, or en-ed, and or end. An, is the infinitive, or verbal, termination:—Luf, (or lov,); luf-an, (or lov-en);—Ed, adjected or adjoined, constitutes our simple verb adjective, Lov-an, ed, lov-en-ed; lov-ande, or lov-ende. Lov*ing*, as we now write and have long written, is composed of the same Infinitive Lov-an; and—instead of the additional termination ed,—ig, of equivalent meaning, has been affixed; and as in the former case—an-ed, en-ed into ande or ende—the e has been transposed, and finally dropt: so in the latter an-ig, en-ig, or in-ig, has become in-ge, ing, ynge, yng. Wachter thinks that Ing sometimes is a termination formed (per epenthesin) from ig, habens, eig-en, habere, to have or hold (to owe).†

Ing:—the termination of nouns, is in A. S. Ung. Ger. Ung; and is used in all (Northern) Dialects, says Wachter, but the Gothic: what it may signify, he adds, is not very apparent: still he rejects the supposition, that it is a mere arbitrary termination; and he states its principal use to be in forming substantives, quæ actionem aut passionem rei significant; as the A. S. Thanc-ung, gratiarum actio: Francis et Alemannis, Auch-ung, augmentatio: Ger. Saml-ung, collectio: and innumerable others,—a verbis oriunda. Wachter has a second termination in ung, which, annexed to substantives, is a note, frequentiæ: this he thinks is from auch-en; aug-ere; and is the same as ig, og, ug; and afterwards per epenthesin ung; as Wald-un, Holz-un, Sylva, locus lignosus, à Wald et holz, lignum. The epenthetic n has already been accounted for.

This termination, so forming nouns, has been commonly supposed to have been assumed from the participial ter. in ing, and it is not at all improbable that, upon this supposition, great numbers of nouns have been formed and introduced into our language.‡ Dr. Johnson, who gives them, after Wallis, the name of verbal nouns, only inserts them in his Dictionary, where he imagines that there are especial reasons for so doing.

Isc, is also a common A.S. termination: it is formed from ic-es, ics, by transposition: and is in English softened into ish. It also denotes an addition: frequently, a small addition, a portion, as white, whit*ish*.—As Oak from Ac, so perhaps Ash, (tree) from As-ce.

Ix, (i. e.) ics or igs, ice, ess: are terminations from the same source. Words with this suffix are usually applied to females, as those with er, or, &c. are to males.

† See Owe, in the Dictionary.

‡ See Mr. Taylor's Additional Notes to Tooke, p. xvii.

Hence also the Lat. verbs in Sco.

Ad, the common A. S. termination; variously written ed, id, od, ud; is now the common English termination *ed. From the Lat. we have some words ending in id, as hum-id; and some in ude, as fortitude. The meaning is—add: and the force of it, to show or denote an addition or adjunction.

The Latin terminations at, et, it,† constituting the third person singular of their verbs, is formed by affixing the article or pronoun, ο-τε, ο-τ-ε, ο-τ, (Lat. id); which is used with a meaning equivalent to that of our own article the; and the force of it is to denote the addition or adjunction, the connexion of the agent, spoken of, with the act. The Sanscrit has the same pronoun in the third person, and the same ending to the third person of their verbs.‡

These terminations of the verb, with the addition of the article ος, us, compose the past participle, at-us . . . whence our terminations ate. . . .

The A. S. and English termination of the third person of the verb th, seems to be the article, the.

And.—We have very sparingly supplied ourselves from the Latin participle in dus; which is formed by the addition of d to the termination 'n; and the further affix of the article, us. The d, appears to have the force of the Gr. δε-ι, and the whole termination to denote το δε-ον, that which ought to be.§ It is called by Tooke, the Official Passive Adjective.

Our superlative adjectives are formed by the suffix, est, which appears to be composed of es—ed, contracted into est, and to have the double force of take, add, in super-lation to the simple adjective.

Al. We have a great stock of words ending in al, from the Latin alis; of which Scaliger says, Qualitatem consistentem significat: and he proceeds to illustrate;—

Triumphalis; qui ex triumpho gradum adeptus est in civitate: *Furia*lis, furiis captus: Mortalis, eadem ratione dicitur, qui morte affectus est: nam quod ad aptitudinem translatum sit, hoc usus occupavit. Cæterum de mortuo primum sic sunt locuti, Mortalis fuit: deinde etiam quum ad viventes respicerent: propterea quod essent ejusdem naturæ, eosdem quoque mortales vocavere: Sic enim capitale crimen dixere quod capite lui meritum esset: quo signi-ficato etiam quæ nondum vocata essent in judicium intellexere.

So much for the usage of this termination, but whence came it? The common termination Ble, Lat. Bilis, has been derived‖ from the Goth. and A. S. Abal, robur, vis; our own Able.

* See Ing. antea. † See Dr. Prichard, p. 137. ‡ Id. p. 95.

§ Hence the very recent Deontology. ‖ See the Dictionary.

But Ab-al consists of two literal roots, and from the latter must have been derived, this termination is al-is: perhaps immediately from the Latin Alis, the ancient mode of writing Alius, Gr. αλλος: of which L is the literal root, as it is also of the Gr. ολ-ος, English All. And, thus, this termination will likewise denote an addition, an adjunction; an appertaining to, a relation.*

It has been already insisted that this organic sound 'm' has given to various tongues and in various forms the pronominal me—that this pronoun, appropriated to the first person, is the terminating syllable μι, in Greek and Sanscrit verbs;† and also of Lat. tenses in am.

It has also been stated that the Sanscrit pronoun of the first person in the nominative case has the double force of I and me; and that, in the accusative case, it has the reduplicate force of me me. The Œolic αμμε has the same double force: So has the Goth. imma, though appropriated to the third person,—in English Him.

Him, them, and whom, are formed by prefixing the pronoun he, the article the, and the pronoun who, to the first portion of the Gothic; which then is deemed a mere termination. But the Gothic im, in the pronominal imma, and the Lat. Hom, in the nominal homo, are the same literal root: And him, i. e. he-im; them, i. e. the or thei-im, whom, or who-im, may be explained he, or said—man, the or they—men, who or what—man or men: the appropriation to case being made for distinction's sake. Scaliger‡ derives Homo from ομ-ως; because man is—animal sociale. Hom-o, (as man also,) is a general term, applied to both sexes; and is probably so applied because, animal parentale; bearing, bringing forth, giving life. The Latin Hum-us, has the same origin.

Om or um—in the Latin E-om or e-um, ill-om, or illum, quom or qu-em, or qu-um—is the same literal root, as im, em, om, in our own pronouns.

The Sanscrit pronoun, Tu-am or twam, of the second person is composed of Tu, Lat. Tu, English Thou, and am; which latter is also found in various cases of the different numbers. In Latin it is Tu-met. The Sanscrit pronoun of the third person is T'am.

N.—This organic sound or literal root is a very abundant source of terminations in different languages.

En.—As ειν with the Greeks, so (says Wachter) an, on, en, apud majores nostros, is the termination of the infinitive.

The A. S. an, the D. and Ger. en, are the English en, also antiently written un, constituting the noun adjective and the plural of nouns; and always meaning—union, adunion, junction, adjunction, addition: as wood*en*, tree*n*.

* See in Lennep, αλλα, αλ-εω, ολ-εω. (Lat. ol-ere, crescere).
† See Dr. Prichard, p. 136. ‡ De Caus. c. 28.

The A. S. an, Gr, ιν, Lat. un, with the article, variously written, as, es, is, os, us have formed the terminations an-us, hum-an-us; en-us, terr-en-us: in-us, can-in-us: Gr. γη-ιν-ος, earth-en, ξυλ-ιν-ος, wooden.

The Lat. An-us, en-us, form by contraction the Lat. participial termination ans, ens: and from the neuter plural of these, in tia, are our terminations, ance, ence; anciently written ants, ents.

An, with the additional termination ed, forms by contraction and, the A. S. participial termination, for which we now use ing.*

It is worthy of remark, in passing, that it is the practice of our language, to employ, en—either prefixed or postfixed, and sometimes both, to augment, or add to the force of words, as to light, to light-en, to en-light-en.

And this termination en, with ed, and ig, our modern y, are the three, which constitute the English adjectives. The terminations, full, ous, ly, &c. are compounds.

R.—Wachter† observes that the German termination er, is, in nominibus officiorum, deemed by some not to be a mere termination, but the same as the Lat. Vir. Camb. ur; and that this conjecture is favoured by the fact that many nouns ending in er, do in various dialects also end in Man; as in Dutch Schipp*er*, Schipp-man, in English, Plow*er*, plow-man. To this same source he also refers the Lat. termination arius, in triarius;—or, in orator, in which (he thinks) they seem to denote man. Er, or, in the Ger. Zund-er, English Tind-er: Lat. Splend-or, Cand-or, he determines to be—simplex terminatio. In the formation of comparatives (he adds) no particle is more fit than er;—nam er, priscis significat ante; and ante, (before), is said not only of time and place, but of quality.

In all these instances, R is the literal root; denoting anteriority, priority, in space or time; the prime person or thing, (male or female) the act-or, agent, or acting cause: and in comparison of adjectives (also antiently written re), priority, superiority, precedence.

In Danish, Er is equivalent to the English am; and in that language it is the termination of the infinitive, corresponding to the Lat. Re: (Re-is, res, a thing). Ar, er, ir, or, ur, with the addition of the article, form the terminations, ar-is, as famili-aris;—arius, prim-arius, orius, suas-orius, ur-us, futu-rus; whence our common terminations ary, ory, ure.

Scaliger considers the Lat. term. aris, orius to be similar to that in al; but to arius, he affixes more force, as Sagittarius, one who knows how to use use Sagitta.

* See Ante; Ing-

† See also Ihre in v. Waer.

The Lat. part. ter. in r-us, is very properly named future, to come, and hither also may be referred the verbs in urio, commonly called Desiderative.

S.—It has been stated that the meaning of the literal root S is Take; The English As, Ger. Es, Lat. Is or us, Gr. ος, are articles, and equivalent to The or That. As a termination es, has the force in English of take: and of various consequences of taking, sc. of taking, numerically, so as to effect plurality,—and thus it forms the plural of nouns : of taking possessively, so as to appropriate the possession,—and thus, it forms the possessive case of nouns; which Wallis calls the possessive adjective : of taking, or attaching, the agent to the act,—and thus appropriating the personality of the agent : and hence, further it forms the third person singular of our verbs.

The Latin has in various cases, and in both Numbers, this same literal root, for the terminating syllable as differently written, as the English, German, Latin, and Greek articles.

The pronoun of the second person is in Greek Nominative Συ, and the termination of the second person of Sanscrit, Greek, and Lat. Verbs is S.

The Latin has Sc for a pronoun of the third person, to which for the sake of emphasis they affixed Met.

The Greek article ος, Lat. is, or us, reduplicated, forms the adjective termination os-us, English ose: and by this reduplication is denoted, as Scaliger* has remarked, qualitatem sub excessu quodam, intentionem qualitatis.

I have now arrived at the close of all that I consider it necessary to say in support of my second position.

1. I have then endeavoured to establish ;—and I must confess a persuasion to be very strongly impressed upon my own mind, that I have not endeavoured in vain :—in the first place : that the simple, articulate, organic sounds, of which written letters are the signa visibilia, are intelligible, indivisible sounds ; that they are words, that those words still subsist, (not in one language only,) and that used alone (I mean without prefix or suffix) they retain their primitive, intrinsic meaning. This was my first step.

2. My second is, to establish : that these words, upon which I impose the name of literal roots, are used as prefixes, and suffixes ; and that, when so used, they retain also this primitive intrinsic meaning.

* De Caus. L. 4 c. 93

But the question forces itself upon us, to what are they prefixed,—to what are they suffixed? The answer is obvious and indisputable:—to themselves, or to some one or more of their own family.

Here then we have so many literal roots, each in single position, each apposed at the beginning,—in the middle,—at the end:—Additur in initio, additur in medio, additur in fine; says the most learned J. Gerard Vossius, who himself only repeated what he had collected from others, and whose dogmata (I do not use the word individiously) others have continued till this day to repeat.

These literal roots then must be the elements of which all the words in all the languages, of all the inhabitants of the earth, must be, and have been composed:—there are no other: And if it were not possible to produce one single syllable of proof in addition;—it is even from these premises an inference of sound reason, that each and every of these literal roots was, in the primæval formation of speech,* used, wherever used, whether as prefix, interfix or suffix,—whether in initio, in medio, or in fine,—as an indivisible intelligible sound, in its original intrinsic meaning.

I say, the primæval formation of speech, and I say so with precaution,—for it cannot be doubted that in time, the cause for usage would be forgotten, and yet that the usage would be itself preserved. Analogy, euphony:—with other reasons or presumed reasons, would become auxiliary to the perpetuation of a custom, which, at its first rise, and during its early progress, would be of indispensable necessity for the common purposes of speech.

My task then, I will venture to affirm, is completed. The third proposition is a legitimate corollary to the two former; and a practical exposition of it would demand an entire work.

The principles of Philology, it is obvious to remark, which are unfolded in the preceding pages, must, in the peculiar province at least of English Lexicography, be considered as exoteric doctrines: they are intended, as they are suited, only for the scholar: by him they must be investigated, and tried, and judged: by him they must be subjected to the rigorous test of experiment.

SECTION I.

And who in time knows whither we may vent
The treasures of our tongue? To what strange shores
This gain of our best glory shall be sent T'enrich unknowing nations with our stores?
What worlds in th' yet unformed occident
May 'come refin'd with th' accents that are ours.

Daniel, Muso-philus.

It may seem singular that a claim for distinction should be seriously urged in favour of a Dictionary, because it contains an explanation of the meaning of words. What pretense, it will naturally be asked, can any work have to assume that title, unless the meaning of words is carefully and satisfactorily explained in it? Do not all Dictionaries profess this to be their main object, and is not their reputation founded upon the diligence and success with which they have laboured to accomplish it? That Dr. Johnson was impressed with a sense of the paramount importance of this portion of his duty, is manifest from the earnestness with which he enlarges upon it, in his "Plan of an English Dictionary." But that his notions of the manner in which it ought to be performed, were very lax and imperfect, the instances which he himself produces to exemplify and illustrate his intended method of proceeding afford a signal proof.

If however his professions of performance are compared with the actual state of the work itself, it will be evident, that he must, at an early period of his labours, have abandoned his original design, if indeed he at all attempted to adhere to it.

In his plan, he writes, thus:

"In explaining the general and popular language, it seems necessary to sort the several senses of each word, and to exhibit first its natural and primitive signification;" as,

"To arrive, to reach the shore in a voyage; he arrived at a safe harbour. Then;—to give its consequential meaning, to arrive, to reach any place, whether by land or sea, as he arrived at his country seat."

In the Dictionary, he writes,—

"To arrive, (Fr. Arriver, to come on shore). 1. To come to any place by water:" and then follow five distinct explanations of meaning.

In his plan, he undertakes, as an Etymologist, to give (as the case may require) the Saxon Original, or, when that cannot be found, to supply the defect from the kindred languages; or, whenever the word is of French Origin, to show whence the French is apparently derived.

1. It is obvious to remark, that in the Dictionary, he does not show the apparent derivation of the French, (Arriver) and that the reader is thus left in ignorance of that which might easily have been told, and which, if it had been told, would have enabled him to judge of the propriety of the explanation.

2. That though the division, proposed in the Plan, into primitive and consequential, is in itself judicious, and correct, yet that in the particular example, it is inaccurately employed. The second meaning of Arrive, is not consequential or inferential; it is not a consequence inferred from the first.

3. That though in the Plan these two meanings alone are given (with a mere remark upon usage), yet in the Dictionary, there are six distinct explanations, intended to be explanations of meaning: And further still, that one half the consequential meaning of the plan, is the entire primitive meaning of the Dictionary.

4. In the Dictionary, the explanation itself is at variance with the Etymology: that is—the primitive signification, ascribed to the word, does not accord with the Etymology upon which it is founded; and the quotation from Dryden, in support of the two, is most unfortunately opposed to both. It ought to have presented an example of some person or thing coming to some place by water, according to the explanation; or, on shore, according to the Etymology: but it is actually of an animal already on shore, journeying by Land, to the Banks of the Nile.

It aggravates the strange incongruity of the whole, that there is but one single interpretation of the noun, Arrival, though every passage quoted to exemplify the six meanings of the verb might be so translated as to admit a substitution of the noun.

There is one general errour pervading the explanations; an errour not confined to the Dictionary of Johnson; but imputable to interpreters in general, who, "seeking the meaning of a word singly from the passages in which it is found, connect with it the meaning of some other word or words in the sentence." This is to interpret the import of the context, and not to explain the individual meaning of the word. And Johnson, by pursuing this method systematically, was led into the accidental but additional absurdity of opposing his authority to his explanation.

This word may be denominated a pattern of his Book, it is selected and protruded by Johnson himself as a Specimen of his Dictionary: and it demonstrates, with painful certainty, that his first conceptions were not commensurate to his task, and that his subsequent performance did not even approach the measure of the original design.

It is, then, needless, and it would be invidious, to accumulate especial instances of failure; —the whole is a failure: and it will appear to be the more conspicuously deserving of that name, when we reflect upon the pre-eminent abilities of its renowned author. Had the Dictionary of the English Language been the production of any writer of less name, a period of eighty years would not have been permitted to elapse without the appearance of a rival. And so far the name of Johnson has been an obstacle to the advancement of Lexicography in this country: it has commanded admirers and supporters: and it has deterred competition.

No author is known to have undertaken the composition of a New Work, nor even to have engaged in the less honourable, but still arduous, and even praise-worthy, enterprize of remoulding and reforming the Old. Additions and supplements to the great increase of its bulk, have been collected and published; but all proceeding in imitation of the method pursued by Johnson.

I have thought it imposed upon me to premise these observations, because they anticipate, and provide an answer to the question which will very naturally be urged. Is there any want, any deficiency in our Literature, which the New Dictionary is intended to supply?—The summary answer is—That the only Dictionary, of which we can boast, was defective and erroneous in the first contrivance, and still more so in the actual composition: that it is in truth a Dictionary, in which we must expect to find neither the meaning of words nor their Etymology. What, then, it will reasonably be demanded, shall we find in this Great Work;—A collection, I reply, of usages, quoted from (in general) our best English authors, and those usages explained to suit the quotations; and those explanations including within them a portion of the sense pertaining to other words in the sentence. It may seem harsh, but it is strictly true;—that a great variety of instances might, with very little trouble, be collected of distinctions, where no differences subsist; and where the quotation subjoined to one explanation might with equal propriety have occupied another position.

To refer again to his own specimen—"Arrive." What difference, in the meaning of the word, can be discerned in the expressions produced by Johnson: "To arrive on the banks of the Nile:" and, "To arrive on the verge of an estate." And yet they are separated, as if different.

It would be gross injustice to the memory of Johnson, if I were not to add my perfect conviction that from his pages might also be chosen interpretations expressed with most admirable precision and completeness: and I fully concur in the opinion of Mr. Nares,* that his authority has nearly fixed the external form of our language, and that from its decisions few appeals have been made.

There is, however, another question which the author of a book of such magnitude and importance, as an entirely NEW DICTIONARY of the English Language, ought to be prepared to answer. And that is; what pretensions has your book to be so designed and so composed as to supply the alleged deficiency? I am happily rescued from much of the embarrassment, and relieved from much of the difficulty, with which, under different circumstances, I should most undoubtedly feel myself oppressed in framing a reply: and I am so—by the manner in which this work was received on its first appearance, and has continued to be encouraged to the present moment of its republication in a separate and improved state.

The twentieth year has now commenced since the publication in the Encyclopædia Metropolitana of the first portion of the English Lexicon—as it is there named,—and I cannot but feel some emotions of pride, when I am reminded that in a work of such a character, as that Encyclopædia, in the construction of which some of the most learned and scientific persons of the day have borne their parts, my own individual portion has never been denied its full meed of esteem. The opinions, indeed, which have at various intervals in the progress of publication been publicly expressed, and privately communicated, were such as to sustain me to the end; "propositi difficultate, non segnior, sed audentior et constantior factus."†

And now that I have persevered to the completion of a labour, which has very truly been pronounced to comprize within it "omnes pœnarum formas," I endeavour to persuade myself that I may send these volumes forth to the world with the unobtrusive confidence of one who knows, in the first place, that he has spared no pains to establish a title to have his name enrolled among those who have advanced the literature of their country, and, in the second place, that such title has been by many,‡ who were well qualified to decide, very explicitly acknowledged.

* On Orthoepy, Part 4, c. 3. Adelung has also commended this department of Johnson's work, and he adds, that Johnson has consigned all orthographic disputes to those, who, from want of more important knowledge, have no other means of obtaining reputation.

† Wachter. Pref.

‡ One name I must mention, that of (I must now say the late) Rev. Edward Smedley, who, for thirteen years, in character of editor of the Encyclopædia, has accompanied me, page by page. He frequently cheered me in my progress. I value his good opinion more than that of any other man, because, competent to judge as the best, he knew the book—better.

SECTION II.

I SHALL proceed now to an exposition of my plan :—

When I first embarked in this undertaking, I was firmly persuaded that the undoubted chief of philosophical grammarians had not spoken either idly or untruly, when he asserted that a New Dictionary ought to be written, and of a very different kind indeed from " any thing yet attempted any where." I felt satisfied that this was not the solitary dictum of one man, that the opinion had penetrated into our schools and colleges, and that it prevailed very generally among the various intelligent and inquiring classes of my countrymen. I further felt that the volumes of Horne Tooke had developed a new theory of language ; that the principles of that theory had, in the main, been well received ; that they had settled deeply in the minds of literary men, both abroad and at home ; and that, upon those principles, I must compose my work. The great first principle upon which I have proceeded, in the department of the Dictionary which embraces the explanation, is that so clearly evolved, and so incontrovertibly demonstrated in the " Diversions of Purley ;" namely, that a word has one meaning, and one only ; that from it all usages must spring and be derived ; and that in the Etymology of each word must be found this single intrinsic meaning, and the cause of the application in those usages.

That each one word has one radical meaning, and one only, is not a dogma of which very modern writers have the sole right to boast. Scaliger asserts it in most explicit terms : " Unius namque vocis una tantum sit significatio propria, ac princeps."* It is one of those many sound principles which have been met with in the writings of learned and sagacious scholars, and which have passed the not uncommon routine of being recognised and admired—neglected and forgotten. It is one of those, which they themselves have employed to very little purpose, and of which we are not warranted in concluding that they saw the tendency with sufficient distinctness to appreciate justly the real value and importance.

It is approached in more recent times, but not boldly seized, by Lennep :—" Ut adeo apparcat paucissimas revera esse proprias verborum significationes ;" † are the uncertain terms in which he expresses himself.

* De Causis, ch. 193. He adds,—' Cæteræ aut communes, aut accessoriæ, aut etiam spuriæ.'

† Analog. p. 41.

That this one, or these very few significations, are to be traced to sensible objects, is affirmed by Lennep, and not doubted by Locke:

"Spirit," says the philosopher, "in its primary signification, is breath; angel, a messenger; and I doubt not, but if we could trace them to their sources, we should find, in all languages, the names that stand for things that fall not under our senses, to have had their first rise from sensible objects."*

"Notiones verborum (says the philologer) propriæ omnes sunt corporeæ, sive ad res pertinentes, quæ sensus nostros feriunt;"† and again, "Nec alias esse (verborum significationes) nisi corporeas, sive eas, quibus res, sensibus externis expositæ, designantur."‡

Tooke is most distinct in the assertion and maintenance of these principles, (the one-ness or singleness, and the source, of the meaning of words); he adopted them as the sole sure foundation upon which philological inquiry could proceed; he, and he alone, has adhered to them consistently, and he has raised upon them an edifice, to which all must look as a model, when devising the ground-plot for a superstructure of their own. His name will frequently catch the eye in the pages of the New Dictionary; not, indeed, because he is an authority whom I never question, and from whom I allow no appeal; but I have done to him that scrupulous justice which I have done to all, to whose labours I have been indebted. Of not one borrowed feather, unacknowledged, would I wittingly permit myself the use.§ Time, however, will assuage the rancour of political hostility;—the mists of ignorance, the fumes of conceit, will dissipate in time; and the immortal author of the ΕΠΕΑ ΠΤΕΡΟΕΝΤΑ will stand forth untarnished and unobscured; as the philosophical grammarian, who alone was entitled to the name of a Discoverer—a name, which "every man, knowing any thing of human nature, will always be backwards in believing himself to deserve."‖ Of him, then, I will now only add, in words scored by his own hand, in the very book from which I transcribe them, and thus intimating how emphatically characteristic he deemed them of himself:

> You cannot shake him,
> And the more weight ye put on his foundation,
> Now as he stands, you fix him still the stronger.
> The Pilgrim, a. 2, s. 2.

I shall be freely pardoned this slight ebullition of grateful feeling towards an author, who, by his writings, conferred upon me two signal benefits: they first cleared my intellects of an accumulated store, which I misprized as philosophy: they, in the second place, taught me sounder doctrine; and the better tenets of that doctrine have grown and ripened into the New English Dictionary.

To proceed. The lexicographer can never assure himself that he has attained the meaning of a word, until he has discovered the thing, the sensible object—res, quæ nostros sensus feriunt;—the sensation caused by that thing or object (for language cannot sever them), of which that word is the name. To this, the term meaning should be strictly and exclusively appropriated; and this, too, may be called the literal meaning.

The first extension of the use of words from this literal denomination of sensible objects, or actions, or operations, is to supposed or assumed similar or correspondent objects or actions, or operations, in the human mind. This—the metaphorical application of the literal meaning—may, for the sake of brevity, be termed the metaphorical signification. It is a meaning transferred; and here commences the broad distinction of literal and metaphorical language.

From this literal meaning, and metaphorical signification, the next step may be named, the consequential; and hence descend, in wide and rapid course, the applications of words in all their multitude and variety. These appear to be what Lennep intends to denote by translatæ significationes;—he has told us, "paucissimas esse proprias verborum significationes;" and he adds: "e contrario autem, translatarum significationum copiam immensam, quæ ex propria notione, tanquam ex trunco arboris rami, quaquaversum pateant." *

To Etymology, then, the lexicographer must first resort; but he must be cautious and reserved in the pursuit of it. Its use for the purpose of a dictionary of a particular language is barely to ascertain the origin, and hence the radical meaning of each individual term in the vocabulary—and though further inquiry will be indispensable in philological researches to trace the origin and formation of tongues, and the dialects of tongues; yet, when the intrinsic meaning is fixed, every lexicographical object is firmly secured.

Etymology, indeed, seems to admit of two main divisions; first, that which decomposes words into their primal, literal roots; and this is peculiarly the province of the philosophical grammarian or linguist; † and secondly, that which (in our own mingled speech more especially) traces their lineal and co-lineal descent from a radical meaning to their present form and use. To this latter, the researches of the Dictionary have been generally limited.

I have judged it the safer, and in every respect more prudent and becoming, course to state with brevity, and yet with clearness, the opinions of preceding Etymologists, among whom the name of Wachter ought to be most gratefully reported; not so much, perhaps, for the soundness of his decisions, in particular instances, as for the value of the materials, which his learned industry has brought together for the benefit of succeeding labourers. I have adopted or rejected his and their opinions, according to the best of my own judgment upon their merits; where I had any conclusion of my own, that I preferred, I have not hesitated to advance it; where I had not, I have left the reader in full possession of all that knowledge which I had collected for myself. I have rather wished to remain exposed to the charge of timidity than of rashness.

While investigating, then, the meaning and consequent usage or application of words, I have considered it a duty incumbent upon the lexicographer to direct his view,—1st, To the etymology and literal meaning;—2nd, To the metaphorical application of this meaning—to the mind;—3rd, To the application consequent or inferred from the literal meaning;—and 4th, To the application consequent or inferred from that which is metaphorical.

In works of general literature (it will be obvious), the metaphorical usage must be of more frequent occurrence than the literal; but the metaphor is in general so palpable, that the greater portion of the language has, in the task of explanation, unconstrainedly submitted to this comprehensive, yet simple, compendious, and adequately explanatory formulary, viz., the etymology, and the literal meaning; literally, metaphorically, and consequentially, employed,—with the words of similar application. And I have occasionally fancied that I had some reason to congratulate myself upon the success with which I laboured to deduce, from this literal or intrinsic meaning, the graduated and connected progression or series of the various and extensive applications of words.

It is, however, only when Etymology shall have furnished these meanings, that we can commence with confidence (to adopt the figure of Dr. Sharpe) the construction of our chain; link after link may be appended in direct succession, to keep commensurate with the enlargement of knowledge and the movements of human thought; and by-chains may be collaterally attached to different links of the main connection, as need may dictate or convenience suggest.

If we cannot enlist the strength of Etymology, we may, in the next place, conjecture the meaning of a word by discriminating some one signification contained in its multitude of usages; and hence presume that we have discovered the reason upon which their propriety is founded. If these usages present so discordant and incongruous a diversity, that no such uniform signification can be discerned, and consequently no such reason be enforced into our service, we have still left, in the third place, the expedient of arranging in some order the terms equivalent in their employment, or nearly so, to that which we may be endeavouring to interpret.

This last effort—even this, the only resource of unavailing erudition and baffled industry, has not been made (as I have already noticed) in the composition of those volumes, upon which the fame of Johnson is said to rest. I use the expression ' said to rest,' because I am satisfied that for whatever fame he may possess—and great, undoubtedly, it is, and deserves to be,—he is not indebted to his Dictionary. Had he, however, made this effort in the construction of his work, he might have escaped, in some measure at least, the censure urged so justly by a very learned and a very sensible writer of his own time * against lexicographers in general, who remove the primary sense out of its place, and break that chain of significations, so necessary to preserve consistency, and relieve the burthen of remembrance. But (and it cannot be too strongly insisted upon) he pursues a course, or rather runs into various courses, of different tendency: he seizes—not the meaning, he does not look for it—there is no etymology; but he seizes, or endeavours to seize the present most popular usage; which may be of ancient, or may be of modern introduction: the explanation stands single, and disconnected—so do its successors, without a base to rest upon: the signification of the context ascribed to the word: the number of distinct explanations continued without restriction, to suit the quotations, where any seeming diversity of application may be fancied;—And thus though it may, to those who still preserve undiminished their reverence for the authority of this extraordinary man, appear the very extreme of hardihood and temerity, I will venture to repeat that he rarely, if ever, even attempts to give the primary sense—the intrinsic meaning of the word, and thence to draw a chain of significations, or, more correctly speaking, to trace the applications in which it has been employed.

Though examples of the practical adaptation of general rules to particular instances, supply undoubtedly the most intelligible and unerring evidence of their truth; yet in the selection of those instances, there is a hazard of appearing laboriously trifling; and in the repetition, of wearying the exertions even of diligence and goodwill. I will endeavour to escape as blameless as I can; but I know not how I can do full justice to my work, unless I afford some further means of comparison with that of Dr. Johnson.

Let us then take first the common word SAD. Dr. J. tells us, that " the etymology of Sad is unknown," but that it means—

1. Sorrowful; full of grief.
2. Habitually melancholy, heavy, gloomy, not gay, not cheerful.
3. Gloomy; shewing sorrow or anxiety by outward appearance.

* Dr. Gregory Sharpe.

4. Serious, not light, not volatile; grave.
5. Afflictive, calamitous.
6. Bad, inconvenient; vexatious. A word of burlesque complaint.
7. Dark-coloured.
8. Heavy, weighty, ponderous.
9. Heavy, applied to bread, as contrary to light.
10. Cohesive; not light, firm, close."

Here, then, are ten distinct explanations of the same word, founded upon no etymological or radical meaning; totally disconnected; with no distinction of literal from metaphorical signification. How is it possible that any word should have such a variety of separate meanings?—It is intelligible enough that, from the literal and metaphorical meaning, a great diversity of application may have extended: but what is the literal meaning, and how are the applications deduced from it? This the New Dictionary professes to teach:

SAD:—Wiclif renders the Latin, Petra, (a rock)—a sad stone: that is, a set (emphatically), firmly set, a fixed, a firm, stone. The Latin, firmitas, firmamentum, immobilitas, he also renders sadness; that is, setness or settledness; steadfastness, firmness, fixedness, stability. The sadness of your bileve, in Wiclif, is in our common version, the steadfastness of your belief. Hence it is inferred, that sad is sat (by the mere change of t into d, constant in our language), and means literally, set, settled; metaphorically, sedate.

From (1), the literal meaning, set, it may be further explained,

(2), Fixed, firm, steadfast or steady; confirmed, compact, cohesive, solid, dense, heavy.

From (3), the metaphorical—sedate, it may be further explained.

(4), Serious, grave, melancholy, gloomy, mournful, grievous.

To these must be subjoined, as a further consequence: A sad fellow; one who does sad or serious things—things that cause sadness, or sad or serious consequences; and, thus, he is a mischievous fellow.

And the etymology is satisfactorily retraced to the Anglo-Saxon, sætt-an or sett-an, sedere, sedare,—to set, to settle. And this example furnishes an instance of the practical application of the orderly process of interpretation in its several gradations.

Let the next instance be the equally common words—Slight, the adj. n. and verb; and Sly, the adj. Dr. Johnson tells us, that slight, the adj., is from the Dutch slicht, that slight the n. is from the Islandic slag'd, cunning; and that the verb is in two of its meanings from the adj. and in the third from the Dutch slichten. And he explains thus:—

SLIGHT, adj. (Slicht, Dutch).

1. Small, worthless, inconsiderable.

2. Not important, not cogent, weak.
3. Negligent, not vehement, not done with effort.
4. Foolish; weak of mind.
5. Not strong; thin, as a slight silk.

To SLIGHT (from the adjective).

1. To neglect, to disregard.
2. To throw carelessly; unless in this passage, to slight be the same as to sling—(Falstaff.)
3. (Slichten, Dutch). To overthrow, to demolish.

SLEIGHT, n. s. (slag'd, cunning, Islandic), artful trick, cunning artifice, dexterous practice; as sleight of hand, the tricks of a juggler. This is often written, but less properly, slight.

SLY, adj. (Slith, Sax. slippery, and metaphorically, deceitful; Slægar, Islandic), meanly artful; secretly insidious; cunning.

The plan of the New Dictionary requires a different process, thus—

SLIGHT, SLY—Slight or sleight, is slayed or sleyed, sley'd, sleyt, sleit, sleight, or slight: the past participle of the verb, to slay;—in Anglo-Saxon, slah-an, to strike, to beat, to beat or cast down.

To slight, a verb, formed in the usual way upon the past participle, is—to beat, to cast or throw down, to overthrow, to destroy, to demolish. Lord Clarendon writes—They slighted and demolished all the works of the garrison: they slighted the castle. To slaught-er an ox, is to strike, to knock it on the head.

Falstaff was slighted (i. e. thrown into the river).

The Letters of Cassius were slighted off: i. e. thrown off, or aside; disregarded; or cast aside, as unworthy of regard.

Slight, the adjective, is—abject; cast or thrown aside or away, sc. as of little value, of little force or strength; and thus,—unvalued or valueless, inconsiderable, inefficient, weak, feeble, small, slender.

And a slight is—a disregard, neglect, disparagement, contempt, contumely.

Slight or sleight of hand—a throw or cast; a dexterous cast or motion of the hand; dexterity; adroitness. Cast was formerly used as fore-cast, project. And thus,

Slight, metaphorically, is—a dexterous, an adroit trick, or contrivance; a subtle manœuvre; a sly action. And Sly (the participial termination ed omitted) is—forecasting or projecting; acting with forecast, caution, circumspection; cautious, circumspect; cunning, wary, crafty, subtle.

A weaver's slay, and sleyed silk, have their origin in this same source.

And here again will be seen an instance of the same process of interpretation, by a formal subdivision, as in the preceding word sad.

These are genuine English words, and they are sufficient to establish beyond the possibility of a doubt, that every effort to trace the progress of such words from their primitive signification to their modern usages must be nugatory and unavailing, if the age of Elizabeth be the remotest period to which enquiry is to be carried.

An example of a single word, borrowed immediately from the Latin, will also exhibit the ignorance in which we must in particular instances have continued of the time of their introduction, had our researches been so limited.

"The verb, to edify," says Mr. Todd, "early in the seventeenth century obtained its moral application,—for thus Bullokar,—to edify;—to build: sometimes to instruct."

Mr. Todd quotes two instances from our common version of the Epistles of Saint Paul, an authority which renders the name of Bullokar worth nothing; and if it had occurred to Mr. Todd to refer to the version of Tindale, whose New Testament was printed in the beginning of the sixteenth century, or to the translation of the paraphrase by Erasmus, published in the middle of that century by Udal, the then Master of Eton, he would have been satisfied that this moral application was the common language of that time.

The metaphor was adopted by the Latin translators from the Greek, and from the Latin it was transmitted into English, somewhere about two centuries and a half before the period affixed by Mr. Todd. It is of common occurrence in the version of Wiclif, which was completed towards the close of the fourteenth century, and it is found in Peers' Plouhman, who flourished some thirty years earlier.

I must still be suffered to specify a few instances of words, which have admitted the general formulary of explanation, without the necessity of resorting to those subdivisions that have been observed in the preceding examples. Etymology is the solid ground upon which these explanations rest; and that they are with propriety and security placed upon that ground, will, I hope, be manifest to those who will take the trouble to recur to the Dictionary itself.

The two words Love and Fear, generally designated as names of leading passions in the human mind, are in reality the names of two acts, to which we are moved by certain passions or affections; and from continued association of the one with the other, the words are transferred from the act to denominate the passion; and the common practice of interpretation is to detail a description of this passion, including a specific exciting object, as the primary meaning of the word. Thus, Dr. Johnson assures us, that Love means—1. The passions between the sexes; that Fear means—1. Dread, terrour, painful apprehension of danger. If we scrutinize a little strictly into etymology, we shall find that the Anglo-Saxon Luf-ian, to love, has a reason for its application similar to that of the Latin Di-lig-ere, to take out or away from (sc. a number), to choose, to prefer: and is formed upon the Anglo-Saxon verb, Hlif-ian, to lift, or take out or up, to pick up, to select, to prefer: and hence the consequential applications are easily deduced. If we pursue the same course, we shall also perceive that to fear, is to fare, Anglo-Saxon, Far-an, to go, to go away; to flee, or cause to flee; to run, or cause to run away; to scare: and hence applied to the feelings of a run-away. The Anglo-Saxon, Fa-r-an, and Latin fa-r-i, are the same word; aliquod fatum, is any-thing, a word gone, gone out, uttered, spoken.

To spark and to speak, (D. Spreck-en), I consider to be the same word; and to mean,—to throw out, to emit, to utter. We call a small particle of light thrown out, or emitted,—a spark: we call vocal, articulate sounds, thrown out, emitted, uttered,—speech. But spark or speech, means (any-thing) thrown out: all other respective applications, are consequential or metaphorical, and connect themselves so closely and easily, that no formal explanatory subdivisions have been at all requisite.

Again, to tell and to till, are the same word, and mean, to lift, to raise. To till with the plough, is to raise (sc. the ground) with it. To tell with the tongue, is to raise (sc. the voice) with it; and here again no formal explanatory subdivisions have been made.

And now I ought, perhaps, to conclude this portion of the exposition of my plan, with full satisfaction that I have placed it in a light sufficiently perspicuous to common attention. But there are two words, so important in themselves, and bearing so much of novelty in the origin ascribed to them in the New Dictionary,—and they will serve also in further illustration of its mode of etymological research,—that I cannot forbear to present them. And these words are Mercy and Belief.

Amerce, Merce, Mercy—Our elder writers use the words amerce and merce, indifferently: to fine, to impose, to exact, a fine, a something in final adjustment; in payment for, or in lieu of, a penalty or forfeiture; in satisfaction of a claim or demand. To be subject to the King's grievous mercy, was to be subject to a heavy fine, payable to the King. The remission of this fine or penalty, and, generally, the remission of punishment, we now call—his Mercy, i. e. his clemency, his compassion. And the question arises, is mercy, in these two usages, two words of different origin, or one word differently applied? T New Dictionary is profuse in quotations from pages of hitherto unexplored antiquity, to establish that mercy, in the latter application—to clemency or compassion—is no contraction of the Latin misericordia, but is transferred or traduced from mercy, a fine: from the fine paid in ransom or redemption, to the deliverance or pardon granted and received in return; and that it is thence further traduced—to the feeling, which, it is assumed, imposes, receives, or is satisfied with, a smaller, instead of a greater, punishment; of a sum of money, for instance, in commutation for life or limb, forfeited to civil or military law.

When we amerce any man (quoth Peers), let Mercy be taxer.*

And this is the Mercy that pervades the whole system of Jewish and Christian theology.†

Believe, Leve, or Live—Our elder writers use, to leve, and to believe, indifferently; and that not only as we now use the latter (sc. to have faith, to give credit), but as we use the verb, to live, or have life; to dwell. The question again occurs—Are these two words distinct in their origin, or one word, differently applied? It should be premised, that believe was written bi leue, be lyue, by lyve, separately and conjointly: and, recurring to our old authorities, we find the verb, by-leve, denoting to lyve by, or according to. "The King would not bileue the lawes that his elders held,"—(Rob. of Gloucester, p. 470), and the noun bileve, applied, not only to life, but to that by which we may leve, or live, the means (or demeans) of life; to that whereon or wherein we may live, the dwelling, the demesne; and the obvious inference is, that it is also applied (metaphorically), to that by which we should live; to a rule of life; to that rule, or that body of rules or laws, by which we do or ought, or know we should or ought, to live. A more emphatic or effective reddition from the Latin version, our venerable translator could not have selected. "Lordis," cried the terrified keeper of the prison, "what bihoueth me to do, that I be maad saaf? And thei seiden, Bileeve thou in the Lord Jhesu, and thou schalt be saaf and thin hous." Such was the primitive question, and such the answer. Such, as our missionaries could testify, continues to be still the question, which they are required to answer. The full explanation stands thus:—

To believe, is, to live by or according to, to abide by; to guide, conduct, regulate, govern or direct the life by; to take, accept, assume, or adopt as rule of life; and, consequentially,

To think, deem, or judge right; to be firmly persuaded of, to give credit to; to trust, or think trustworthy; to have or give faith or confidence; to confide, to think or deem faithful.‡

* Peers' Plouhman's Vision, p. 130.

† Johnson:—Mercy, n. s. (fr. Merci, contracted from Misericordia, Latin). 1. Tenderness; goodness; pity; willingness to spare and save; clemency, mildness; unwillingness to punish. 2. Pardon. 3. Discretion; power of acting at pleasure. To Amerce, v. a. (Amercier, fr. οφθαλμων μεν αμερσε, seems to give the original). To punish with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine, to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is used by Spenser of punishments in general.

‡ Johnson:—To Believe, v. a. (Gelyf-an. Saxon). 1. To credit upon the authority of another, or from some other reason than our own personal knowledge. 2. To put confidence in the veracity of any one.—To Believe, v. n. 1. To have a firm persuasion of anything. 2. To exercise the theological virtue of faith.

SECTION III.

My next step is—to the writers whose works have supplied the quotations, produced for the purpose of exemplifying, confirming, and illustrating the explanations which precede them. These, for the sake of preserving one uniform mode of illustration, have been divided into periods. The first commencing with the Rhyming Chronicles of Robert of Gloucester and Robert of Brunne,* and continuing through the reigns of Henry VIII. and his two immediate successors; the second extending from the accession of Elizabeth to the return of the second Charles, or from Hooker and Spenser to Milton and Bp. Taylor: the third, from the Restoration to the establishment of the House of Hanover upon the throne; or from Waller and Barrow to Pope and Samuel Clarke: the fourth from the reign of George II. to the beginning of the present century.

The quotations that have been selected from Gloucester, Brunne, and Peers' Plouhman, always take their place at the head of the array. Then follow, Wiclif, supported, whenever possible, by an early translator of the Bible; next, in rank and order, Chaucer and Gower, free, as the great patriarchs of our speech, from any intermixture with their successors. Chaucer, with whose "ditees and songes glade," his contemporary Gower declared, even then, "the londe to be fulfilled over all;" and Gower himself, so justly named "the Moral Gower," who, he tells us,

> Undertoke
> In Englysshe for to make a boke,
> Which stant betwene ernest and game.
> Conf. Am. b. 8.

After these will be found, in due arrangement, a host of writers, whose works have never been before ensearched, for the important service of lexicography: our matchless translator of the Bible, Tindale; Udal, and his associates, the translators of the Commentaries of Erasmus; Berners, of Froissart; Sir Thomas More; the Chronicles of Fabyan, and the Voyages of Hackluyt; with many others, whose compositions, small in size, but of inestimable worth, have hitherto been merely placed upon the shelves of the collector, as rarities to gaze at. In this region of unexplored country, I have travelled with most gratifying success; and I may have been induced sometimes to expend the treasures, of which I have possessed myself, with a hand so lavish, as to risk the imputation of wasteful liberality.

In the second period, also, especially where a scantiness has appeared in the first, prodigality has been preferred to penuriousness, and sometimes perhaps even to an economy, too scrupulously sparing.

In this period, many names will occur that have not at all—or, if at all, very scantily—been produced as authorities; more especially, Daniel, Drayton, Holland, the translator of Pliny, Livy, Plutarch, &c.; North's Lives of Plutarch, Chapman, Beaumont and Fletcher, &c. &c.

In the times subsequent, a more rigid parsimony has been exacted.

After the quotations from Chaucer and Gower and their few predecessors have been disposed of, the order of proceeding is this:—to produce the subsequent quotations according to the arranged series of the words; as many of those words from authors of the first period as my collected authorities would permit; these ended, then to commence the second period, and pursue the same order: and so with the two remaining periods. It may be proper further to observe—that when usages of the sub-derivatives had been furnished in the earliest periods, it was not deemed expedient to load the book with a succession of examples of all these, through all the modern periods of our literature, but rather to reserve this honour for the primary members of the family.

The uncouth aspect of the lines which are cited from Robert of Gloucester, Robert of Brunne and Peers' Plouhman, will not be suffered to repulse all literary readers entirely from a perusal of the quotations, of which writers more recent, but still comparatively antient, have supplied a valuable stock. If they have any curiosity to cultivate an acquaintance with "much phrase that now is dead," they will not neglect the name of Wiclif, and the more especially as they will derive assistance in the construction of his venerable English from the less antique interpreter, who usually attends him. Their curiosity will acquire strength from the gratifications of success; and Chaucer and Gower will stimulate their zeal to become masters of those older productions of their native tongue, which are collated in the pages of this Dictionary.

It is, most unquestionably, an unavoidable consequence of this mode of chronological arrangement, that a metaphorical application will not unfrequently take precedence of a literal, but the manner of explanation which I have already described, will render this a matter of but slender importance, when compared with the advantages that are secured by an adherence to the plan. By commencing with authorities in the earliest period of English composition, and continuing them successively through the different stages by which the language has arrived at its present state of copiousness and (I would add) refinement, this Dictionary aspires to the pretension of presenting to the English reader an insight into some very interesting and instructive portions of a history of his native tongue.

The next peculiarity that I shall proceed to specify, consists in the classification of the words, with their immediate derivatives;* followed by one comprehensive interpretation, adapted to the whole. There are instances, where this latter portion of the rule was not fairly practicable; but they are exceptions.

This method of arrangement is attended with these advantages, at least. The tediousness of incessant repetitions, by no means necessary for the rational use of a Dictionary, is entirely avoided,—a more extensive as well as intelligible deduction of usages from the intrinsic meaning may be consistently pursued, and instruction unsought will be forced upon the mind. The whole family, or rather, more generally, the whole branch of a family, is presented to the eye and understanding at once: a collateral branch, or even all collateral branches, may be conveniently placed in juxtaposition, and a single glance will acquaint us with the relative barrenness or fertility of each. A little additional attention, a more prolonged inspection, will, with the less difficulty, afford the opportunity of distinguishing such abuses as may have silently gained admission in the process of composing words; and of forming some laws to direct us in our efforts towards a general improvement of our vocabulary.

The very fact, that this arrangement presents a stumbling block (and such may be the case), to hasty and impatient reference, confirms the propriety of adopting it. Dictionaries are too frequently considered as books to which idleness may fly for instantaneous relief from ignorance, and find all that it wants without the trouble of perusing more. But a certain degree of knowledge and of thought, a certain portion of Grammatical Learning, is undoubtedly required, as a condition precedent to the use of the New Dictionary;—but the painfulness of thinking will speedily diminish; facility will be the result of very short practice;—a difficulty surmounted presents an encouragement to further efforts;—the continuance or renewal of enquiry will be frequently invited and not infrequently repaid; while by the habitual exercise of contemplating each individual word in close alliance with the immediate descendents from the same source, more enlarged and enlightened notions may become familiar.

These remarks may and probably will seem trivial to persons even of small pretensions to literature; perhaps more so to them than to the sounder and more reflecting scholar. I address myself to the more unlearned of the present, and to the youth of the rising generation.

* E. g. Abstain, v Consist. v.

The former, I am quite aware, still constitute a far too numerous portion of the community, and I should not feel excused to myself, if I did not premonish them, that by no very toilsome exertion of their faculties, it is possible for them to make a valuable addition to their proficiency in the language of their country. I must, however, exact from them this degree of previous erudition: that they should know an abstinent man to be one who abstains; the contents of a book, to be the matters contained in it; and then that they keep in mind, when consulting the Dictionary, the necessity of referring directly to the word from which each subderivative is formed, viz., to abstain and to contain. If, then, in a reference for the purpose of finding other such subderivatives, they should, as most assuredly they will, be disappointed, if they expect to discover them at all times in their precise alphabetical position, let them mitigate their disappointment by the reflection, that, from the very circumstance of their being obliged to make that slight employment of their intellect, which will bring the rule to recollection, they are instructed and improved; that at every instance, the labour of recollection will decrease; and that the quantity of knowledge gained at the moment above the quantity required by the exigencies of the moment, may be held in reserve for future service. They will soon become sensible that, though the Dictionary presents obstacles to be surmounted, it will thoroughly recompense the trouble.

The words, with their immediate derivatives, thus classed together, are succeeded by the cognate terms in other languages: if the origin be Latin, for instance, by the Italian, French, and Spanish; and by the Latin also: if the words be of Northern origin, by the German, Dutch, and Swedish; with the Anglo-Saxon and Gothic also.

One comprehensive interpretation, upon the principles already explained, subserves for the whole family: this, I repeat, was the rule—instances have occurred, demanding a deviation from it, when this general interpretation did not comprise some especial usage of a subderivative; then that usage has been remarked and accounted for. No one surely needs to be told that an agent is one who acts; that a student is one who studies; a seller, one who sells. It will, however, tend most effectually to a better understanding of his native tongue, if the reader will previously subject the different terminations to a careful examination.* Tooke† has observed of some of these terminations, that "they will afford sufficient matter for enter-

* A connected view of them is prefixed to the Dictionary. "Quid, (Ung. terminatio) significat, non liquet. Sed non ideo meram et arbitrariam vocis desinentis flexionem esse existimem, cum quia vetustas et longus sæculorum ordo multa delevit, quæ hodie ignorantur, tum quiæ jam sæpe vidimus, multis particulis, quosdam inesse secretos significatus, quos neque nostra neque superior ætas animadvertit." tainment to future etymologists;" they have afforded something better than entertainment to myself; and I hope I shall not be singular in the gratification I have derived from the pains with which I have endeavoured to trace them to their source.

The mode of classification pursued in the New Dictionary, does not, however, reach the refined and scientific speculations of certain scholars, who are sturdy contenders for a radical reformation upon the plan of the Greek Thesaurus. My objection is simply this, that an English Dictionary so constructed would be useless in the hands of any, but the already learned scholar, or of the sanguine student whom no difficulties could dishearten. The middle path, in which I have persevered, though it is obstructed by no formidable impediments to an easy progress, still leads by ascending steps to more commanding views than by the ordinary road can possibly be attained.

The ease with which it enables us to place in close comparison different branches of the same family, and the advantage, as far as the encrease of our vocabulary is in question, have been already noticed. Let any one, for instance, take the trouble to compare the two compound terms, conduce, and deduce; he will perceive that the subderivatives, which have crept into current use from the former, nearly double in number those that have been received, perhaps required, from the latter. Let him pursue this investigation, through other words of a similar description, (such as tract, with its compounds, contract, detract: form, with its compounds, conform, deform, inform); and he will see with what a running pen our Dictionaries may be swelled by the addition of thousands and tens of thousands of words—all formed simply by affixing our common terminations, upon regular principles of analogy,—and which seem merely to be waiting for the decision of rashness or discretion upon their claim to admittance among those to which they are manifestly allied. Even under the one of the two first named, so much more copiously supplied as it is than its fellow, he will find room for an encrease.* In short, no task of dull diligence presents a more prompt reward than that of augmenting our catalogue of words. Latinisms, Græcisms, Gallicisms, Americanisms, all formed upon the same principles of construction which guided our early scholars in the choice of words, now in ordinary use, might be struck off as if by the magic power of machinery: our language might be crowded with swarms, to satisfy the cravings of pedantic affectation; and a new and erudite Euphuism be created, which "the flower of our youth," to use the expression of the Oxonian biographer, would no doubt eagerly learn to "parly." I am not speaking of terms in science; they (dabiturque licentia sumta pudenter) are formed by scientific men who feel, or at least should feel, the want before they attempt to supply it. I may be allowed to allude here particularly to the word Auscult, and its subderivatives, auscultation, auscultatory; recently added to the nomenclature of medical men. Such words will point to an æra in science.

In my endeavours to collect and settle the vocabulary, I have enjoyed and availed myself of the large store of materials accumulated by Johnson and his editor Mr. Todd, the various supplements and provincial vocabularies, and the notes of commentators upon our older poets. In addition to these, a very abundant coacervation was methodically amassed for my own peculiar use. But I have directed my exertions rather to those sources which would enable me to ascertain the meaning, and deduce the application of the established body of our language, than to add to the number of those upon which, for the sake of distinction, I have so often bestowed the title of subderivative.* Our rules and principles of analogy are so well understood, that, by adhering to them, good sense ought never to be at a loss to make any serviceable addition to the abundant copiousness of our speech. Some, perhaps many, words of this description, may be found in this Dictionary, that have not hitherto been inserted in any other; and I believe that the same encrease mny be affirmed with respect to words compounded with prepositions both of our own and of foreign growth. These latter, too, would readily admit of a multitude of their own kind.

I have still to give some reasons for the state of the vocabulary, as it will be found in the Dictionary. In the first place, then, words called Archaic, and which are now obsolete, have been diligently sought for; and all such, but no other, as could contribute any aid to the investigations of etymology, have been as carefully preserved. Provincial terms have occasionally been summoned to bring the weight of their testimony in support of the same cause; and the very useful little Glossaries, from the learned Ray to Mr. Brockett and Mr. Moore, have been duly consulted, and the assistance derived from them as duly avowed.

To acquire a knowledge of the rise and progress of philosophy and general literature in our country, we must toil through the dreary mazes of much false philosophy; and keep attention awake amid the oppressive dulness of much barbarous literature. Our language is an inseparable portion of the two. And we should remain in great ignorance of its history, and, if the expression may be allowed, of its rights and liberties also, if the vocabulary of a Dictionary were confined to those words only, to which the partial taste of more modern ages has allowed the character of classical. Each word will be found with a quotation subjoined

* Perhaps it is not sufficiently borne in mind, that these derivatives and compounds are the only kinds that we can create into new words, by new combinations. Primitiva vero penitus nova in linguam introduci non possunt:—So says Valcknaer (Obs. 25). His reason is not very good, but it has passed upon his authority from some one author or more by whom it has been used, and the reader is as little obliged to believe for instance the fables of Pliny, as to adopt the language of his translator, or to imbibe the metaphysics of More and Cudworth, as to employ their scholastic terms.

Various pedantic and scholastic* terms have, then, been received, which have now grown into disuse: some, because they cast a light upon others still in continued currency; some, because they inform us of the topics which formerly employed the pens of philosophers and divines, whether they were engaged in amicable discussion, enforcing accredited doctrines, or, more commonly, in polemical strife—combating the friends or the antagonists of disputed theories. Some again, because presenting instances of failure;—and even thus teaching a lesson of caution to ourselves; and all because they may extend our knowledge of the many "vicissitudes of mutation" which the language has sustained in its descent to these times; when change is at work upon it, with all the wild energies of a restless and indiscreet spirit of improvement.

"For all an example, a pattern to none," Swift.

There is another class of terms which must not be passed without a specific notice. "They are," as Ben Jonson calls them, "a kind of composition" (he should rather have said of apposition) "wherein our English tongue is above all others very hardy and happy, joining together, after a most eloquent manner, sundry words of every kind of speech." Our poets and divines abound in words of this description, and the utmost care has been taken to remark upon those few that gain an import by their combination, which they do not possess when employed disconnectedly; and a full interpretation of their manner of signification has been reserved for the word Hyphen in the body of the Dictionary.†

There are other sorts of words of which it remains yet to speak, with relation to the propriety of admitting them into an English Dictionary, professing to be a Dictionary of Words merely, and not of Arts and Sciences.

The first, and indeed the only question, really is—not whether there should be any Dictionary comprising these words; but whether there should be one Dictionary or two; whether technical and scientific words should not of themselves constitute an entire work.‡

* Of all new coinages, words of this last description ought to be resisted most determinedly; because they have a tendency either to perpetuate old philosophical errors or to introduce new.

† Some of our old writers carried this composition to an extreme, which modern ingenuity would be hard set to surpass. For instance,—Chapman translates μελίφρονα οινον. Od. 7, 182,—Honey-sweetness-giving-minds wine.

‡ A Dictionary of scientific and technical terms could not be complete without diagrams; it could but define the word, not describe the thing, without them.

That a separation into two would have a very strong claim to preference, may be maintained for these reasons:

1. Upon the unquestionable fact, that, by a division of labour, the several works would be better performed.

2. That those who are scientific and not literary, or who are literary and not scientific, might want the one and not the other: that, if there be but one book, to obtain what they do want, they must encumber themselves with what they do not: if there be two, one or both may be procured.

These appear to be sound and sufficient reasons against the union. In the mean time, I can only add that all the powers in my possession, all the means which I could control and manage in the exertion of them, have been held in requisition, and devoted to the performance of my own work. Another Dictionary of other words, must be the labour of another and a younger hand.*

With these impressions, I feel little disposed to offer upon this head any excuse for inconsistency and incompleteness. My sins of omission† must be ascribed to necessity on my part, and to a conviction that they ought to be supplied from another quarter. My sins of commission may be excused, because I have been the only sufferer; the public are gainers by the surplusage or over-measure: and my acts and deeds, exhibited in proper place, may be regarded as patterns to follow, not examples to shun.

I have left the orthography and accentuation as I found them; though a few errors in the former, and some old usages in the latter, have been noted as they passed. Our antient authors (as Mr. Nares very truly observes) were so careless of Orthography, that it is not uncommon, in some of their writings, to find the same word spelt more ways than one in the course of a single page. In authors, more antient than he seems to have been acquainted with, this indifference may be found apparent in the very same sentence. There have been systems formed for an entire reformation, but all have perished. Johnson, who found our mode of writing to his time unsettled and fortuitous, reduced our vocabulary to some degree of uniformity, and I have already expressed my opinion of his success. Much may yet be done, without rendering the practice of preceding times obscure or unintelligible, and in the proper places will be found such improvements suggested, as seemed to be practicable without violent change.

* Opus exegi.—Plura et meliora faciat, qui potest. Ego, qui nec ab ætate, nec a fortuna vires sumere possum, in posterum libens abstinebo, moniti memor antiqui; Solve senescentem. Wachter. Epilogus.

† A few unintended omissions are supplied at the end of the 2nd volume, among which will be found the word—RETROSPECT.

The grammarian and the lexicographer have some duties in common, and there are some peculiar to each. The Dictionary has been confined within its own province. A complete History of the Language must be the work of their combined labours; that portion, which it is incumbent upon the lexicographer to perform, has already been insisted upon as a characteristic feature of this book; that which falls within the duties of the grammarian, the grammarian has yet to accomplish.

ΘΑΛΑΤΤΑ, ΘΑΛΑΤΤΑ.

I AM now approached to the final close of a work, which has occupied a large and important measure of my life. In the succession of years, during which I have been thus pursuing my slow but ceaseless journey, many of those, who, cotemporary with myself, had engaged in contributing to the construction of the Encyclopædia, men younger, and with a fair promise rather of reading my name in the daily notices of the dead, than of having their own perused by me, have dropped into the grave. Many, too, in closer and dearer connection have ceased to watch my progress, and confirm me in moments of weariness and depression. I have never been allowed to dismiss from memory, had I been inclined to do so, the premonition, which was forced upon my mind at the very outset of my career;—That the labours of the three chiefs of Etymological renown, who from the first to the last were to become my inseparable associates, were posthumous. That the Latin Etymologicon of Vossius was dedicated by his son to a friend of the father, as a work—jam olim a parente tibi promissum; that, for the English Etymologicon of Skinner, we are indebted to an anonymous friend; that Junius was ushered into the world under the editorial protection of Lye;—and that, moreover, the Saxon and Gothic Lexicon of Lye was destined to receive the same superintendent care from the hand of his Biographer Manning. Their productions, however, were happily in a state, or nearly so, fit for publication; but the Author of the Diversions of Purley has not left behind him any unwrought fragments to mitigate the sorrow, which every scholar must experience, that the hours of his twilight were suffered to expire in darkness, if not wholly unemployed, yet insufficiently directed to the completion of his work.

No man will now harbour any fear of degradation in the ranks of literature, because he has devoted his portion of ability and learning to the drudgery of a Dictionary: he will remember that Johnson for some years laboured to establish his name in the catalogue of Lexicographers; and that the Philosopher of Wimbledon was known to have made some preparations for assuming the same character. But the Composer of this Dictionary may be arraigned for a vain glorious estimate of himself, his studies, and his book, if he ventures to express a sympathy in the feelings with which the Great Historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire describes himself to have been filled, when he had penned the last page of his immortal volumes. In some of his emotions I may be allowed to participate: not assuredly in the proud sentiment of established fame, and independent fortune: yet very sincerely in the consciousness, that, whatever may be the fate of the work, the life of the author must be short and precarious. I take leave, as he did, of an old, though I cannot add at all times an agreeable, companion. But, as the exercise of our faculties, either of body or mind, is a main ingredient in the constitution of human happiness, I should, I confess, if, like the historian, I were about to take an everlasting farewell of my book, scarcely possess the power to do so without some suggestions that might compel me to falter between gladness and regret. An English Dictionary, a Dictionary of any living language, is, however, a work so peculiarly calculated to invite, and even to exact, from its author the benefits of supervisal, that the fault will be my own, and the penalty also, if I allow my spirits to sink under the pressure of idleness. Beyond this exertion, however, my expectations do not pretend.

In conclusion—I cannot forbear to remark, that however toilsome in general, and however unproductive in part, may be the labours endured in the collection and arrangement of the materials for an English Dictionary, the Author of it has it in his power, at the present æra, to congratulate himself upon the enjoyment of a prospect, much more rich and spacious than could fall to the lot of the compiler of a similar work in any Language of the European Continent:—

The world is all before him.

And, perhaps, no subject of philosophic contemplation, possessing a livelier interest, can be proposed to a thoughtful and enlightened mind: than a comparison of the field of renown, which even 240 years ago was sketched by the graphic powers of a very humble poet of our own country, with that over which the more lofty genius of the Roman Lyric bard extended its survey. When the former imagined himself soaring on wing, "non usitata, nec tenui," he prescribes the shores of the Bosphorus, the Syrtes of Getulia, and the Hyperborean plains, to be the utmost confines of his flight; he was content that the Colchian and the Dacian should become familiar with his name, and that the "peritus Iber, Rhodanique potor" should rehearse his song. Our Poet, Daniel,* animated probably by the spirit of discovery and general enterprize, for which the princes of the house of Tudor, and the illustrious men, who adorned that period of our history are so distinguished, depictures to his fancy far more ample and resplendent scenes of glory: not, indeed, in personal exultation, for the offspring of his own muse especially, but in patriotic pride, for the language in which he wrote.

These scenes are no longer imaginary: "The treasures of our tongue" are spread over continents, scattered among islands in the Northern and the Southern Hemisphere, from the "unformed occident, to the strange shores of unknowing nations in the East." The sun, indeed, now never sets upon the Empire of Great Britain. Not one hour of the twenty-four, in which the earth completes her diurnal revolution; not one round of the minute hand of the dial is allowed to pass, in which on some portion of the surface of the globe, the air is not filled with "accents that are ours." They are heard in the ordinary transactions of life; or in the administration of law, or in the deliberations of the senate house or council chamber; in the offices of private devotion, or in the public observance of the rites and duties of a common faith.

Such being the facts, upon which Englishmen may delight to dwell, I may myself be suffered to avow a peculiar gratification in the plan upon which this Dictionary has been composed. It is a copious and careful record of the Language from its earliest state; it contains the choicest sentiments of English wisdom, poetry, and eloquence; it may be deemed a supplial of many books; and as such merely it may be estimated at higher worth in foreign climes than on its native shores. At the very moment, when I am concluding this final page, I have reason to believe that the early portions of these volumes have found a resting place upon the tables of an English Settler on the banks of La Plata: I am assured that they are admitted to relieve the languor of military inaction at the Mess of Abednuggar; and that they have already found employment for the acuteness of nearly a century of critics in the United States of North America.

TERMINATIONS.*

PART I.

Ac, ic, ive:—(adj. and sub.) Ic, from the Gr. Ive, from the Latin. Having the action or energy, the power or strength; having the active qualities:—that can or may; and, by corrupt usage, that does.

Cardiac, that can or may hearten, or give strength to the heart. (cor.)

Angelic, that has the active qualities of angels.

Active, that can or may act; that has the power to act.

Suasive, that can or may, that has the power to, persuade.

A critic, one who can, who is able to, criticise: by usage—who does criticise.

A fugitive, (by usage) one who does fly.

Aceous, (adj.) usually suffixed to names in Natural History.

Cetaceous, } Having the, or the natural, or characteristic, qualities of a whale
Papilionaceous, } (ceta) or of a butterfly (papilio.)

Ac-y, ac-ious,—Lat. ac-ia, from the adj. in ax, ac-is,—which has the meaning of ac, augmented by is.

Fallacy, Lat. fallacia, from fallax; fallacious, that can or may deceive: decep*tive*.—

Also Ox, oc-is, as

Ferocious, that has the active, the natural, qualities of a wild beast (fera.)

* Et hoc labore, nunc eo libentius defungar, cum ut habeam, quo lectorem in progressu operis remittam;—et lector habeat, quo recurrat, tum ut repetitiones (quarum alias nullus modus ac numerus fuisset) jure præcludi possent.

Wachter. Pref. Sec. 5.

† P. 30.

Ish, softened from isc (is-ic) a common A. S. termination: and used as a diminutive: as,

Black-ish, with a small addition of black, something less than, tending to the colour of, black.

Verbs with this termination: as accomplish, nourish, embellish, were formerly written; accomplise, nourise, embellise: and are formed upon the Fr. participle.

Ix, i. e. Ic-es, first softened into ice, then into ess, and applied to females, in contradistinction to er, applied to males.

Inheritrix, -trice, -tress, one who, a female who, can, or may, or does inherit.

Age, Lat. Agium: something added, imposed, charged upon: an impost, a charge, a duty: as,

Beaconage, Pontage, } toll charged for beacon, for bridge, (pons.)

Also applied more generally to agency, or action, or to the state caused or produced by the act: still denoting an addition, as,

Parentage, Peerage, } the added, or additional, state of being or becoming a parent or peer.

Y is the A. S. ig, as blood-ig, bloody: and denotes that the noun to which it is suffixed is to be added (ek-ed) to some other noun: as a bloody knife.

Ing is a compound ter. in-ig, contracted into ing: and having the meaning of en augmented by y. It forms the present part. of verbs; as,

Act, pres. part. act*ing*; and is equivalent to the Lat. ens. Ag*ens*, act*ing*, an act*ing* man, one who acts, an ag*ent*.

We have also abundance of nouns substantive in this termination from the A. S. ung, as,

A. S. Thanc-ung, a thanking or giving thanks.—These nouns are not applied to the person;—and the termination is equivalent to that in ion:—with some occasional distinction in usage; as—the acting of a comedian, the action of an orator:—the former applies to the whole manner, in which a part is done, or performed: the latter—to the gesture.

Ad, ed, id, od, ud. Ad and od are the common A. S. term. Ed, suffixed to nouns and verbs, forms our regular noun adjective and past participle: and as such denotes that the noun or verb to which it is suffixed is to be added to another noun. Ed is sometimes contracted into 'd, sometimes changed into t, for the sake of easy pronunciation. Such changes are organically necessary.

Blabb-ed, blab'd
Lapp-ed, lapt
Logg-ed, log'd
Lock-ed, lockt
Maz-ed, maz'd
Miss-ed, mist
Liv-ed, liv'd
Puff-ed, puft

In the pronunciation of b, g, d, z, v, and also in the Fr. J, there is an almost imperceptible motion or compression of or near the larynx. In p, k, t, s, f, and sh, there is not this compression: and if the e be omitted in pronunciation after any of these latter, the d must be changed into t.

The reason for doubling the consonant in blăb-bed and also blăb-bing, rŏb-bed, rŏb-bing, &c. is that the b is heard in conjunction both with the o preceding, and the e or i following: in rōbed, rōbing; whether pronounced rō-bed, or rōb-ed; only one b is heard. In appāl-led; two l's are heard distinctly: in equalled, travelling, not so distinctly, as the accent does not fall upon the l.

At-e, et-e, it-e, ion, from the Lat. at-us, et-us, it-us, and are equivalent to our own termination ed.

We also form verbs upon this Latin past participle, as upon others; thus, to animate, from animat-us; from which by suffixing ed, we form a new participle: giving more energy; as animate, animated, from this prep. we have also some nouns, Reprobate.

Our nouns in ation, etion, ition, are immediately from the Latin;—they are equivalent to our own termination ing, from the A. S. ung; (see Ing.) They denote action or the effect of action.

And, end, und, from the Lat. andus, &c. we have very few.

Multiplicand, that ought to be, must be, multiplied.

Subtra-hend, that ought to be subtracted.

Al, from the Lat. al-is (so alius, an or one other, was antiently written): it denotes some quality or thing attached or added;—and, thus, appertaining or belonging, relating to, appertaining to such relation: according to, affected by, subject or subjecting to.

Natural, appertaining to, according to, nature.

Mortal, affected by, subject or subjecting to, death. (mors.)

Am, em, im. Him, the pronoun is, he-im; them, (formerly also hem), is the or thei-im: whom, is who-im. Im is equivalent to man (Lat. Hom-o).

An, en, in, un. Our English termination en, (or un as antiently written), in A. S. an, i. e. one, as an adjective termination, denotes that the noun to which it is suffixed, is to be un-ited or joined to another noun: as a gold*en* (antiently gold-un) sc. ring.

Christian, adj.—sc. religion, to be un-ited, to be expressed.

A Christian, n. (sc. man, understood.)

En is also added to verbs to augment the force; as to haste, to hast*en*; to black, to black*en*.

From the Lat. ter. an-us, en-us, in-us, we have our ter. ane or an, ene, ine: humane, human, terrene, canine:—An-us, enus, by contraction are ans, ens, and hence are our ant, ance, ancy;—ent, ence, ency. The Latin ans we should write ant, and ens, ent: yet it is the common usage to write defend*ant*, from defend*ens*. And there are other violations of this plain rule.

Ignorant, ignorance, ignorancy.

Innocent, innocence, innocency.

The ter. ant, ent, are equivalent to our own ter. ing; as, accordant, according; consistent, consisting.

Ignorance, } The quality, the state, of being ignorant, or innocent.
Innocence, }

Ar, er, or, our. Ere, is a common English word, Ere day, Before day. It means before; relative to the human figure, the fore part, the front of the person: generally, the person, and also priority in space, time, quality, &c.

Er, added to an adj. as, just, just-er, denotes a priority, a superiority;—in comparison.

Added to verbs it forms nouns, and denotes the person who, the thing that: as Beggar, robber, sailor;—the person who,—begs, robs, sails. Cutter, that which cuts.

The ter. or, in names of persons immediately from the Lat. we usually preserve,—as factor, doctor; auctor, aucthor, author; but in other nouns from that language, we introduce the vowel u, as labour, honour, splendour;—with which our pronunciation conforms.

In very many words or and er were written indiscriminately; and no general rule can now distinguish them; it is not the custom, nor is it necessary, to make any difference in the pronunciation.

In nouns formed by ourselves from Latin verbs, we now usually write er, as defender, continuer, observer, enquirer.

Also in words of our own growth:—do-er, cutler, dealer, draper; and by adding y to certain of these, we have nouns designating the habitual acts, the employments, trades, &c. as cutlery, drapery.

From the Lat. Aris, arius, orius, we have both nouns adjective and substantive.

Auxiliar, } Giving aid, one who gives aid.
Auxiliary, }

Mercenary, taking hire, one who takes hire.

Monitory, Consolatory, } Giving admonition or consolation.

Dormitory, a room or apartment for sleeping.

Ous, from the Lat. us, Anxius, anxious.

Ouse, ose, from the Lat. os-us;—the article reduplicated—and thus denoting a something more than the single us, as ebrius, ebriosus—but custom makes little difference with us.

Anxious, Lat. Anxius, Ambitious, Lat. Ambitiosus, } A man who feels, who acts with, is actuated by, anxiety or ambition.

Eous, in Right*eous*, is a corruption of wise.

PART II.

Ble, Able, and ible, (Goth. Abal, strength, power, force, see Ble in the Dictionary.) The Lat. Bilis was, with few exceptions, used passively, and thus distinguished from iv and ic; as,

Arable, that may be ploughed.

Audible, that may be heard.

Able, or ible,—according to the Lat. word, from which we take ours.

Ile, Docile, that may be taught:—contracted from Docible.

Fragile, that may be broken.

But we have a large list of words in this ter. used actively, as,

Conducible,—properly—that can or may be conduced, or conducted, is used indiscriminately with conducive, conducent, or conducing, that can or may, that does, conduce.

Dom, A. S. Dom: from dem-an, to deem, or judge,

King-dom, the territory, which a king dooms or judges, rules, or governs.*

Freedom, the doom, judgment, will of the free.

Full, Fear-ful,—full of the feeling of fear.

full of that which causes the feeling.

* Wallis. Dominium regis. See p. 139. Gill—Regnum ubi rex jus aut sententiam dicit, p. 32.

Thus a fearful man, may be either a timid man, who feels fear,—or a daring man, who causes others to fear. The context must decide. But

A fear-ful thing, as a fearful storm; is a thing which, a storm which causes fear.

A hand full, a mouth full;—written handful, mouthful,—always refer to some other thing; as full of gold, meat, &c.

Many old words in this ter. have grown into disuse, e. g. { Advice / Amaze } full, and many new ones have been, and will yet be, formed.

Fy, from Lat. fi-eri, to be, or become, or cause to be; to make.

To terri-fy, to cause to be afraid.

mollify, to cause to be soft. (mollis.)

Such words are formed as they are wanted, e. g. codify, codification; acidify, acidification; silicify, &c.

Hood, means raised; something raised; sc. to a certain rank, degree, state, or condition, quality or kind. It is also written head.

Priest-hood, the state or rank of priest.

Maiden-hood, or head; the state or condition of a maiden.

Likeli-hood, the state or condition of being likely.

Ize, Ism, Ist, } These term. are borrowed from the Gr. The verbal term. ize seems to have been intended to express the future effect, the continuance of an action commenced in present time, and is so far emphatic.

Thus, to civil-ize, to bring to a civil state (progressively.)

Particularize, to continue to state particulars.

Baptize, (emphatically βαπτειν) to dip ceremonially.

It seems also to denote—to continue a custom—to do as others usually do, as to Hellenize, to Atticise,—to do as the Greeks, or as the Athenians do; and thus it implies imitation, whence the ter.—

Ist, is not unfrequently applied as a diminutive,—Grammaticist, is an imitator of the Grammarian.

A Grammaticaster is inferior still. But

Ist is commonly used as—the person who, as,

Catechist, Dogmatist, } he who { catechises. / dogmatises.

Catechism, that which the catechist teaches.

Dogmatism, that which the dogmatist practises,—the habit, the manner, of a dogmatist.

The writing of this ter. is not uniform: when from this Gr. origin, it should be written ize; to distinguish it from ise, in such words as advise, prise, &c. unless we we were constantly to write z, when we pronounce it.

Kin, a diminutive; man-kin, or mani-kin; of the kin or kind, of man: a little man.

Less, i. e. loose, or dismiss, as,

Hope-less, } Dismiss, hope, or rest, and, consequently, become destitute or devoid, in Rest-less, } want, of hope or rest.

Our vocabulary is continually receiving additional compounds of this termination.

Let, a diminutive; from A. S. Lyt, little, as,

Ham-let, } A little or small Ham, or Ring.
Ring-let, }

Our modern poets have made some additions to words of this kind.

Ling, denotes long-ing, or belonging, or pertaining: applied to progeny or offspring, (in proper names) as Edmund, Edmund-ling; and, thence, used as a diminutive.

Goose, gos-ling. Dear, dearling, or darling,

Ly, antiently written lich; corrupted from like;—suffixed to nouns forms adjectives as love, lovely:—to adjectives, forms adverbs, as stiff, stiffly.

Men, }
Ment, } Lat. Men, ment-um, monium; (Lat. Mens, monere):
Mony, }

Regi-men, any thing meant, or intended, or designed, as a rule or regulation

Monu-ment, any thing meant, or intended, or designed, to keep in, put in, mind. (mon-ere).

Testa-ment—Ali-ment } Anything meant or intended to testify; to nourish, support, or Testi-mony—Ali-mony } maintain.

Ness;—in A. S. Ness is a promontory; and ness, the ter. denotes the prominent, or distinguishing, or characteristic quality, or, generally, the quality, as,

White-ness, } The quality of being white or good.
Good-ness, }

Ship, D. Schap; Schape; from the A. S. verb Scipp-an, to shape, to form, or fashion, or figure. Thus, Landskip, is Land-shape, the form or figure of the land, or country.

Friend-ship, the form or fashion; mode or manner; constituent qualities, state, condition, of a friend.

Some, is Same: and as a ter. denotes the sameness or similarity, the coincidence or agreement; having some quality, degree, as,

Venture-some, } Similar to, like, one who ventures, or that which troubles.
Trouble-some, }

Ster is applied to the person, as,

Spinster, } One who spins or weaves.
Webster, }

Ty, from the Lat. Tas, as honestas, honesty.

It has the same force as ness, as,

Cruelness, cruelty; frailness, frailty.

Ward, may be joined to the name of any person, place, or thing, to or from which our view may be directed, as,

Home-ward, looking to, with a view to, home, (re-garding home.)

These terminations are the common, legitimate, and almost exhaustless source, to which our writers and speakers ever have resorted, and to which they will continue to resort, in the formation of subderivatives.

PREFIXES.

It does not appear requisite to say more of the prefixes than has already been said of them in the third section of the Preliminary Essay; and of each in its place within the Body of the Dictionary.*

Both as it regards terms framed by these prefixes,† and by the suffixes or terminations, more especially the latter,‡ our vocabulary presents an appearance by no means regular and consistent; and, however copious we may pronounce it to be, the Lexicographer must, to use the expression of Lord Bacon, "note it to be found deficient." Within the last twenty years much has been done, but much still remains; it is a work, however,—to continue in the language employed by the same profound observer, though upon a more solemn subject,—that "is to bee done with wisedom, sobrietie, and reuerence, or not at all."*

It cannot be expected that in a Dictionary the novelties of cotemporaneous existence with itself should be collected and recorded.

ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

A.

A, is the first letter, and first vowel of the alphabet, in all the modern, and in most of the ancient languages.

B. Jonson observes, that all our vowels are sounded doubtfully: in quantity (which is time), long or short; or, in accent (which is tune), sharp or flat. A is long in debăting; short in stomăching; sharp in hate; flat in hăt. With us, he adds, A is pronounced less than the French à, as in art, act; but when it comes before l, in the end of a syllable, it obtaineth the French sound, and is uttered with the mouth and throat wide opened, the tongue bent from the teeth, as in all, small, and in salt, malt, balm, where a consonant followeth the l. For this latter mode of utterance, Wilkins adopts the Gr. α; and describes it to be framed by an emission of the breath betwixt the tongue and the palate, the tongue being put into a more concave posture, and removed further off from the palate. The former mode of utterance of a, as in bat, bate, he describes to be framed by an emission of the breath betwixt the tongue and concave of the palate; the upper superficies of the tongue being rendered less concave, and at a less distance from the palate. The adoption of the Greek character, as a mean of distinction, seems to be far preferable to any mark or figure of reference, a plan generally adopted by modern orthoepists.

A, the English article, means one; in A. S. an.

In A. S. on means in; and has been corrupted in English to an before a vowel, and to a before a consonant; and in writing and speaking it has been connected with the subsequent word: hence a numerous race of adverbs. From On dæg, On riht, On lenge, On brædе, On bæc, On lande, On life, On middan, On wihte, On twa, On weg; we have Aday, Aright, Along, Abroad, Aback, Aloof, Aloe, Amid, Aright, Atwo, Away. See Tooke.

A, in such expressions, as a-hunting, a-begging, a-going, admits of a similar explanation; i. e. on or in, the act of hunting, begging.

In the A. S. the prefix a to words also in use without it, is of constant occurrence. In some words, which have descended from that language, the word with this prefix is preserved; e. g. in Awake, Abut, Ashamed. In a far greater number the prefix is dropped; e. g. In Abeodan, to bid; Abitan, to bite; Acelan, to keel or cool.

A per se (A by itself), as denoting pre-eminence, is not unusual in our old poets.

Of Troye and Greece.

ABA'ND, v. Aba'ndon, v. Aba'ndon, n. Aba'ndoner. Aba'ndoning, n. Aba'ndonment. } Fr. Abandonner; It. Abandonare; Sp. Abandonar. Various etymologies have been suggested:—from the Fr. Bandon, Liberty: from A. S. Abannan, to denounce: from Ban to curse: from à ban donner, to give up to a proclamation, and others. See Menage and Wachter. See also Ban, Band, and Banish, infra. The A. S. Bannan, or Abannan, would give the past participle, Abanned, Aband (and so the word is written in the Mirror for Magistrates, and Spenser). Upon this past participle, the English Abandon, and also Fr. It. and Sp. appear to have been formed: and to Abandon is—

To band or bind, or put in bondage; to stay, or cause to stay, or remain in; to leave in, or give up to, a state of bondage or entire subjection.

And then simply—

To resign; to quit, to desert, to forsake; and consequently, to reject or cast away: to repel or drive away: to banish.

Abandonment, n. is used by Cotgrave in v. Abandon. The authorities quoted are very modern: Abandoning appears also to have been a common noun; but the old noun was Abandon: applied to the act, the thing, or the person.

ABI'E, is very variously written. By Chaucer, Abeyge, Abeye, Abie; which Tyrwhitt says is Saxon, and means "To suffer for." In Piers Ploulman, Abugge. In Gower, Abeie, Abedge, Abudge. In Chaucer, are found the participles Abuying, Abien, Abought. And in Gower, also, Abought. Skinner adopts the verb, To buy (in preference to the A. S. Abid-an, to abide), as the more simple etymology. In Shakespeare (infra), Abide, thus, should be Aby.

In all the examples following, "buy or pay for, dearly, cruelly, sorely," appears to be the meaning.

To wipe off; to cleanse—by wiping or scouring.

Gillius reckons up 155 publicke baths in Constantinople, of faire building: they are still frequented in that citie by the Turkes of all sorts, men and women, and all over Greece and those hot countries; to absterge, belike, that fulsomeness of sweat to which they are then subject.

Burton. Anat. Melancholy, p. 238.

Abstersion is plainly a scouring off, or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluide; and cutting between them and the part.

Bacon. Naturall History, § 42.

Abstersive and mundifying clysters also are good to conclude with, to draw away the reliques of the humours, that may have descended to the lower region of the body.

Bacon. Naturall History, § 65

This I admire how possibly it should inhabit thus long in the sense of so many disputing theologians, unless it be the lowest lees of a canonical infection liver grown to their sides, which perhaps will never unclasp, without the strong abstersive of some heroic magistrate, whose mind, equal to his high office, dares lead him both to know and do without their frivolous case putting.—Milton. Tetrachordon.

Nor will we affirm that iron indigested, receiveth in the stomach of the Ostridge no alteration at all, but if any such there be, we suspect this effect rather from some way of corrosion, than any of digestion * * * * *; but rather some attrition from an acute and vitriolous humidity in the stomach, which may absterse and shave the scorious parts thereof.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 22.

And contemplating the caliculer shafts, and uncous disposure of their extremities, so accommodable unto the office of abstersion, not condemn as wholly improbable the conceit of those who accept it, for the herb Borith.

Id. The Garden of Cyrus, c. 3.

A tablet stood of that abstersive tree,
Where Æthiop's swarthy bird did build her nest,
Inlaid it was with Lybian ivory,
Drawn from the jaws of Afric's prudent beast.

Denham. On Chess.

Indeed simple wounds have been soundly and suddenly cured therewith, which is imputed to the abstersiveness of this water [Epsom], keeping a wound clean, till the balsome of nature doth recover it.—Fuller. Worthies. Surrey.

And let th' abstersive sponge the board renew:
Let some refresh the vase's sullied mould,

Pope. Homer. Odyssey, b. xx.

Yet many simples have other qualities, which seem chiefly to reside, though not in an elementary salt or sulphur such as sourness, saltness, a caustick or a healing faculty, abstersiveness, and the like.—Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p. 117.

To draw away, or separate some part from other; and thus, to refine, to purify. And then—

That which is general in language or reasoning, withdrawn from, not confined to, particular qualities or circumstances.

Looke heere vpon thy brother Geffreyes face,
These eyes, these browes, were moulded out of his;
This little abstract doth containe that large,

Shakespeare. John, Act ii. sc. 1.

Pal. ——But man, the abstract

Of Heaven hath modell'd, in himself contains Passions of several qualities.

Ford. Lover's Melancholy, Act iv. sc. 3.

If it were not in a sacred subject it were excellent sport to observe how the same place in Scripture serves several turns upon occasion, and they at that time believe the words sound nothing else, whereas in the liberty of their judgment, and abstracting from that occasion, these commentaries understand them wholly in a different sense.

Taylor. Liberty of Prophesying, s. 3.

If we consider a spiritual life abstractedly, and in itself, piety produces our life, not by a natural efficiency, but by divine benediction.—Id. Great Exemplar, pt. iii. s. 17.

In this science or mystery of words, a very judicious abstracter would find it a hard task to be any thing copious, without falling upon an infinite collection, &c.

Mannyngham. Disc.

[Christ annexes rewards to] the bare practice of those things, which are at the very present, though they were not commanded, and if they should not be rewarded in another life (I mean abstractively from these enhansments of them), infinitely esteemable and preferrable before the contraries, which must farther cost us so extreamly dear, if we will choose and pitch our design upon them, and resolve to go through with that unthrifty purpose.

Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 465.

The mind makes the particular ideas, received from particular objects, to become general; which is done by considering them as they are in the mind, such appearances, separate from all other existencies, and the circumstances of real existence, as time, place, or any other concomitant ideas. This is called abstraction, whereby ideas, taken from particular beings, become general representatives of all of the same kind; and their names general names, applicable to whatever exists conformable to such abstract ideas

Locke. Essay on the H. Underst. b. ii. c. 11, § 9.

I own myself able to abstract, in one sense, as when I consider some particular parts or qualities separated from others, with which, though they are united in some object, yet it is possible they may really exist without them. But I deny that I can abstract one from another, or conceive separately, those qualities which it is impossible should exist so separated; or that I can frame a general notion by abstracting from particulars in the manner aforesaid. which two last are the proper acceptations of abstraction.

Berkeley. Principles of Hum. Knowledge, Introd. § 10.

Or whether more abstractedly we look,
Or on the writers or the written book,
Whence, but from Heaven, could men unskill'd in arts,
In several ages born, in several parts,
Weave such agreeing truths?—Dryden. Religio Laici.

As the abstractedness of these speculations [concerning human nature] is no recommendation, we have attempted to throw some light upon subjects, from which uncertainty has hitherto deterred the wise, and obscurity the ignorant.

Hume. On Human Understanding, s. 1.

Here then is another source of what has been called abstract terms; or, rather, as you say, another method of shortening communication by artificial substantives for in this case, one single word stands for a whole sentence.

Sir T. Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. vii. c. 13.

And therefore old abstrusities have caused new inventions; and some from the hypothesis of Copernicus, or the diurnal and annual motion of the earth, endeavour to salve the flowes and motions of these seas, illustrating the same by water in a boal.—Id. Ib.

From nature's constant or eccentric laws,
The thoughtful soul this general inference draws,
That an effect must pre-suppose a cause.

Prior. Solomon, b. i.

As to some other passages, that are so [obscure] indeed, since it is the abstruseness of what is taught in them that makes them almost inevitably so: it is little less saucy, upon such a score, to find fault with the style of the Scripture, than to do so with the author for making us but men.

Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p 267.

Yet it must be still confessed that there are some mysteries in religion, both natural and revealed, as well as some abstruse points in philosophy, wherein the wise as well as the unwise must be content with obscure ideas.

That there is a motion or agitation of the parts of the egg by the external heat whereby it is hatched, is evident of itself, and not (as far as I know) denied by any, and also the white substance is absumed, and contexed or contrived into the body of the chick and its several parts, is manifest to sense. Boyle. Works, vol. iii. p 69.

Christians abhorred this way of obsequies, and though they stick not to give their bodies to be burnt in their lives, detested that mode after death; affecting rather a deposture than absumption, and properly submitted unto the sentence of God, to return not unto ashes but unto dust again.

The name and place of the thing granted were ordinarily expressed, as well before as after the conquest: but the particular manner of abuttalling, with the term itself, arose from the Normans, as appeareth in the Customary of Normandy, cap 556, where it is said, that the declaration must be made par bouts & costes desittes terres saisies, of the abuttals and sides of the said lands seised. Bout signifieth the end of a thing, abbouter to thrust forth the end

Anciently written avance: in French avancer, avance. To bring into the van (qv.)

In Robert of Gloucester, the van guard is called the vaunt wardes, and in more modern authors, the vaunt guard.

To forward, or bring, to put forward, into the front or fore-ground, the van or vantage ground. To propose, or offer to notice or attention; to promote, to prefer, to profit.

Chaucer uses the adverb avaunt, forward; and also the noun avaut, and the verb avante, which, Mr. Tyrwhitt says, are French, and mean boast, to boast. But this is a consequential application. An avaunter or advaunter, or, he who avaunteth, vaunteth, cometh avaunt, puts himself or his deeds forward, obtrudes them, is a boaster. And this application is common in the elder writers. See VAUNT.

Another application of avaunt is, to go forward, to pass on, to go on, to begone.

ADVE'RT, v. ADVE'RTENCE. ADVE'RTENCY. ADVE'RTENT. } Fr. Advertir, Avertir; It. Avvertire; Sp. Advertir; Lat. Advertere, (Ad-vertere,) to turn to.

The difference between the old verb, to adverse, and the still common verb, to advert, is in the application. To Advert, is—

To turn to, to regard, to look at, to observe, to attend to, to consider, to remark upon.

But in my inward thought I can aduert,
And oft I said my wit is dull and hard;
For with her beauty thus God wot I ferd

ADVISE, v. } Fr. Adviser, Aviser; It. Avvisare; Sp. Avisar. To advise is usually derived from the Bar. Latin Adviśare, (q. d.), to see to, to look to. Junius suspects (and is confirmed by Wachter) that Advisare is from the Ger. Wisen, to show, instruct, direct; and the ancient mode of writing the word viz. wyse, confirms this etymology. It is the A. S. and English Wis-an, wise; to wisse, to wist. Our application of the word is this—

To look, listen, or attend to, with care, caution, prudence; to consult, to deliberate, to counsel, to inform, to warn, to admonish. See AVIZE.

The person who pretends to advise, does, in that particular, exercise a superiority over us, and can have no other reason for it, but that, in comparing us with himself, he thinks us defective either in our conduct or our understanding. For these reasons, there is nothing so difficult as the art of making advice agreeable.—Spectator, No. 512.

While things are in agitation, private men may modestly tender their thoughts to the consideration of those that are in authority; to whose care it belongeth, in prescribing concerning indifferent things, to proceed with all just advisedness.—Sanderson. Judgment in one View.

ADULATION, n. } Fr. Adulation, Adulatoire; It. Adulare; Sp. Adular; Lat. Adulatio, from Aduluri. Our calling therefore doth require great industry; and the weakness of it consequently is well represented by those performances which demand the greatest intention, and laborious activity. It is stiled exercise, agonistick and ascetick exercise.—Barrow, vol. iii. Ser. 20.

As are all the expressions in the foregoing verse, so is this apparently agonistical, and alludes to the prize set before propounded, and offered to them that run in a race, for their encouragement.—Hp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 14.

The author, though possessed of fortitude to stand unmoved the expected bursts of an earthquake, yet of feelings, so exquisitively poignant as to agonize under the slightest disappointment.—Goldsmith. Pres. State of Polite Learning.

The virtue and good intentions of Cato and Brutus are beyond question: but to what purpose did their zeal serve? only to hasten the fatal period of the Roman government, and render its convulsions and dying agonies more violent and painful.—Hume, Ess. 3.

AGRA'RIAN, adj. } Lat. Agrarius, Agrestis;
AGRE'STICK. } from Ager, a field.

Agrarian is applied to the distribution of fields or lands. Agrestick, to that which is rustic, rude, unpolished.

An equal agrarian is a perpetual law establishing and preserving the balance of dominion by such a distribution, that no one man or number of men within the compass of the few or aristocracy can ever be able to overpower the whole people by the greatness of their possessions in lands.—Harrington. Oceana, p. 34.

Their agrarian laws were such, whereby their lands ought to have bin divided among the people, either without mention of a colony, in which case they were not oblig'd to change their abode: or with mention and upon condition of a colony, in which case they were to change their abode, and leaving the city to plant themselves upon the lands so assign'd.—Harrington. Oceana, p. 61.

Agrarian laws, began to be promulgated within three and twenty years, and continued till the end of the commonwealth to produce the same disorders.

Locke. On Hum. Underst. b. vi. c. 1.

As nothing that is agreeable to us can be painful at the same time, and as such: nor any thing disagreeable pleasant, by the terms; so neither can any thing agreeable be for that reason (because it is agreeable) not pleasant, nor any thing disagreeable not painful, in some measure or other.
Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 2.

The agreeablenesse of dissimulation doth almost every day surmount the homely simplicitie of truth; nay, and some would have it passe for a rule of court to confesse that he perceived the stars, if another would maintaine it to be night at high noone.—Evelyn. Of Liberty & Servitude, c. 5.

Knowledge then seems to me to be nothing but the perception of the connexion and agreement, or disagreement and repugnance of any of our ideas.
Locke. On Hum. Underst. b. iv. c. 1.

What would I not give, to have you read Demosthenes critically in the morning, and understand him better than any body; at noon, behave yourself better than any person at court; and, in the evenings, trifle more agreeably than any body in mixed companies!—Chesterfield, Let. 177.

The alder is of all other the most faithful lover of watery and boggy places, and those most despised weeping parts or water gulls of forests.—Evelyn. Sylva, c. 18.

Then first on seas, the hollow'd alder swam.

Everich, for the wisdom that he can
Was shapelich for to ben an alderman.

In a seculer common wealthe he is called to be a maior, that before vsed hymself stoutely in the wardenship: and agayne he is promoted from being maior to be iudge, or the alderman, because he behaued hymselfe well in his mayoralty.—Udal. Paul to Timothy, c. 3.

Ealdor, so written in our ancient language, is properly an elder or senior, yet an ealdorman, which we now call an alderman, was such in effect among our ancestours as was tribunus plebis with the Romans, that is, one that had chiefe iurisdiction among the commons, as being a maintainer of their liberties and benefits.—Verstegan. Restitution, p. 326.

O happy art! and wise epitome

These [lord Bacon, the earl of Strafford, archbishop Laud], and many more, under different princes, and in different kingdoms, were disgraced, or banished, or suffered death, merely in envy to their virtues and superior genius, which emboldened them in great exigencies and distresses of state (wanting a reasonable infusion of this aldermanly discretion) to attempt the service of their prince and country out of their common forms.—Swift. On the Fates of Clergymen.

Frith. Workes, p. 113.

In this island the old drink was ale, noble ale: than which, as I heard a great foreign Doctor affirm, there is no liquor that more increaseth the radical moisture, and preserves the natural heat, which are the two pillars that support the life of man.—Howell, b. ii. Let. 54.

ALONG, v.
ALO'NG, ad. & prep.
ALO'NGST. } From A. S. Lengian, to long, to make long, to lengthen, to stretch out (or, ourselves after, or for what we eagerly desire,) and, consequentially—

To desire eagerly. See To Long.

Along, the adv. in one usage, is merely on long, or on length, as in Chaucer. In the other usage it is the past part. and means produced: it was along of you; all produced, caused, effected of or by you. The Anglo-Saxon used two words for these two purposes, Andlang, Andlong, Ondlong, for the first; and Gelang for the second: and our most ancient English writers observed the same distinction, using endlong for the one, and along for the other.—Tooke, vol. i. p. 42.

Here I saile the youe alle myn heritage,

Ambition is like choler, which is an humour that maketh men active, earnest, full of alacritie and stirring, if it be not stopped. So ambitious men, if they finde the way open for their rising, and still get forward, they are rather busie than dangerous, but if they be checkt in their desires, they become secretly discontent, and looke upon men and matters with an evill eye, and are best pleased when things go backward: which is the worst property in a servant of a prince or state.

AME'LIORATE, v. AMELIORA'TION. } Fr. Améliorer; Low Lat. Ameliorari, melius valere, says Du Cange. Lat. Melior, Melius, that which is more willed, more wished for, more desired.

To make more desirable, to better, to mend, to improve.

This word, though frequent in speech, is not of common occurrence in good writers. See MELIORATE.

I never saw a scene more pleasing to the eye, or more satisfactory to the mind of every person that feels himself interested in the welfare of his fellow-creatures; his humanity must exult at the probability of their lot being so much ameliorated.—Swinburne. Tr. through Spain, Let. 36.

The class of proprietors contributes to the annual produce, by the expense which they may occasionally lay out upon the improvement of the land, upon the buildings, drains, inclosures, and other ameliorations, which they may either make or maintain upon it; and by means of which the cultivators are enabled, with the same capital, to raise a greater produce, and consequently to pay a greater rent.

Smith. Wealth of Nations, b. iv. c. 9.

A'MEN, interj. אמן, Heb. and thence the Greek Αμην, used in Scripture, and still preserved in our different Christian churches at the conclusion of prayer: it signifies assent and desire, as, verily; so be it; or so it ought to be. In this sense it exists, with little alteration as to sound, in the languages of most countries where Christianity has been known.

For if thou expresse and syng furth the prayses of God with a language, which no man knoweth, how shall the unlearned, when aunswereth in steade of the people, make aunswere with the vsed woorde, Amen, when thou haste ended thy prayer of thankes: for by puttying this woorde at the ende, that is confirmed, whiche was spoken before in prayers or hymnes.—Udal. 1 Epistle to the Corinth. c. 14.

Bp. Hall. Censure of Travel.

AME'NABLE. The Italian Menare, and Fr. Mener, are derived, by Menage, from the Latin Minare; pellere, to drive. Vossius writes largely upon the etymology of Minare, but unsatisfactorily. Wachter, (in v. Mine) is persuaded that it is of Celtic origin (sc.), from Menn, a place; and that Minare is nothing else than to move from place to place. Fr. Amener, is to bring or lead unto, to fetch in or to, (Cotgrave.)

Amenable then may mean that may be moved, brought—sc. to answer inquiries, to account for actions; or may it not rather be—subject to the jurisdiction of a Mesne Lord: to be summoned before him, adjudged by him: and then, generally, subject to trial or examination.

And the first permission of this was, for that in those times when that graunt was made, the Irish were not amenable to law, so as it was not safety for the townes-man to goe to him forth to demaund his debt, nor possible to draw him into law.—Spenser. View of the State of Ireland.

AME'RCE, v. AME'RCEMENT, or AME'RCIAMENT. } Lat. Merces; A merendo, says Vossius, after Varro; and Mercre, whence Merendo, from the Gr. Μερος, a part or share. See MERCE, and MERCY.

By the ancient law, punishments affecting life or limb, were remitted upon payment of a fine (merci). To be subject to fine was to be subject to merci, or to be amerced.

To take a portion, or share, of money, or goods; to impose a fine, or penalty; to exact a recompense; to punish.

A'METHYST. AMETHY'STINE. } Fr. Améthyste; It. Amatista; Sp. Amathyste; Lat. Amethystus; Gr. Αμεθυστος, non ebrius, a priv. and μεθυ, wine; restraining from wine.

Applied as—the name of a certain jewel, according to Pliny, because it resists drunkenness; an opinion which Plutarch rejects. See the quotation from him.

As for the amethyst, as well the herb as the stone of that name, they who think that both the one and the other is so called, because they withstand drunkennesse, miscount themselves, and are deceived: for in truth, both are named so of the colour: and as for the leafe of the herb, it hath no fresh and lively hew, but resembleth a winelesse weak wine, as one may say, that either drinketh flat and hath lost the colour, or else is much delayed with water.
Holland. Plutarch's Morals, p. 560.

Per. Alack, alack, his lips be wondrous cold;

The strength also of the spirite cõtinually encreaced in him, daily more and more shewing it self foorth in his countenance, in his passe, in his talk, and in his doynges in all whiche there was not so muche as any one pointe, but it was euen full of the spirite of meekenesse and humilitie, of charitee, of amiablenesse, and of godly zele.—*Id. Now for whatsoever we can love any one, for that we can be his friend, and since every excellency is a degree of amiableness, every such worthiness is a just and proper motive of friendship or loving conversation.

There is nothing more amiable in nature, than the character of a truly good man: a man, whose principal business and pleasure it is to make all men easy with whom he has any concern, in the present life, and to promote as far as in him lies, their happiness likewise in that which is to come.

A'MICE. In A.S. Amet; clothed, apparelled, (Somner.) Fr. Amict; It. Ammitto; Sp. Amito, from Lat. Amictus, past part. of Amicire, to clothe. The Fr. Aumasse; It. Almucia; Lat. Almucia, derived by Menage from Amicire, and by Wachter from Ger. Mutze, a covering of the head, from Meiden, to cover, appears to have been a different article of dress. Nor was this [using of the right hand] onely in use with divers nations of men, but was the custom of whole nations of women: as is deduceable from the Amazons, in the amputation of their right breasts, whereby they had the freer use of their bow.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iv. c. 5.

The gospel does most certainly require us to renounce some things, which the man of the world may not be very willing to part with. If amulets do work from their bodies, upon those parts whereunto they are appended, and are not yet observed to abate their weight; if they produce visible and real effects by imponderous and invisible emissions, it may be unjust to deny the possible efficacy of gold in the non-emission of weight, or deperdition of any ponderous particles.

The only quintessence that hitherto the alchymy of wit could draw out of names, is Anagrammatisme, or Metagrammatisme, which is a dissolution of a name, truly written, into its letters as its elements, and a new connexion of it by artificial transposition, without addition, subtraction, or change of any letter into different words, making some perfect sense applyable to the person named.
Camden. Remains. Anagrammes.

The whole system of the created universe, consisting of body, and particular incorporeal substances or souls, in the successive generations and corruptions or deaths of men and other animals, was, according to them [the ancient atomists], really nothing else but one and the same thing perpetually anagrammatized, or but like many different syllables and words variously and successively composed out of the same pre-existent elements or letters.
Cudworth. Intel. System, p. 40.

The schoolmen tell us there is analogy between intellect and sight; forasmuch as, intellect is to the mind, what sight is to the body. AND. Skinner knows not whether from the Lat. Addere (qd.) Add, by the insertion of n, as in render. Lye supposes it to be the Greek επι. Tooke, that it is the imperative An-ad of the verb, Anan-ad, dare congeriem. It would be more correct to say that And is composed of An, the imperative of An-an, to give or grant, and the N. Ad, congeries, a heap. thus An-ad, An'd, and; and that it always means—

Add, or grant, give this to that, &c.

Is not this And the participle termination Ande or ende, as leeande or lovende, afterwards softened into ing?

An is used by R. Gloucester, and other writers, exactly as they use And. And is also not unfrequently used as An.

Bolingbroke. Letter to A. Pope.

Antiquity has preserved a beautiful instance in an anecdote of Alexander, the tyrant of Pheres, who, though he had so industriously hardened his heart as to seem to take delight in cruelty, insomuch as to murder many of his subjects every day, without cause and without pity; yet, at the bare representation of a tragedy, which related the misfortunes of Hecuba and Andromache, he was so touched with the fictitious distress which the poet had wrought up in it, that he burst out into a flood of tears.—Sterne, Ser. 5.

If you have any thing worth communicating, in return, I hope you will not refuse me the trouble of giving me the intelligence; not only as we are all of us rationally fond, you know, of news, but because interesting anecdotes afford examples which may be of use in respect to our own conduct.—*Melmoth. Consignari is used in antiquity for any signing with the Cross, and *aneuling. ANE'N, prep. ANE'NST. ANE'NT. ANE'NTIS. ANE'YNTIS. } The Lat. Apud (the Gr. Παρα) is rendered by Wiclif, Anentus. A tergo, by Phaer, Anenst our backs. Anenst, in the Pardonere and Tapstere, seems to signify, Concerning. Anen, and Aneyntes, in Maundeville, Against, opposite to. A. S. Nean, near, is the etymology proposed by Skinner; and A. S. Ongean, ex adverso, is preferred by Dr. Jamieson, who, under Fore-anent, cites from Luke viii. 26. Foran ongean, over against, Galilee. But an etymology, which will satisfactorily account for the various applications of these words, is still to be sought. Stowe writes foreaneust.

And Jhesus biheld hem and seyde anentis men it is impossible, but not anentis God for alle thingis ben possible anentis God.—Wiclif. Mark, c. 10.

Plato (for ought I can perceive) differs not much from this opinion, that it [the Soule] was from God and knew all, but being incloced in the body, it forgets, and learnes anew, which he calls reminiscentia or recalling.
Burton. Anat. of Mel. p. 26.

When they [the Jewish copyists] had written a word, or part of a word, wrongly, and immediately saw their mistake, they left the mistake uncorrected, and wrote the word anew after it.—Lowth. Isaiah. Prelim. Dis.

ANFRA'CTUOSE. ANFRA'CTUOUS. ANFRACTUO'SITY, n. } Fr. Anfractueux, (Anfractuosite, Anfractuosity, Cotgrave); Lat. Anfractus, (am, around, and fractus, past part. of Frangere, to break.)

Broken round, so as to destroy the regular arch or circuit; turning or winding about.

It is true they are not; but then I say it is also ten to one but it will be so in any instance that shall be made fruitful with anfractuous and involv'd consequences.
bp. Taylor. Rule of Conscience, b. ii. c. 3.

Some [Unicorn's horns] are plain, as that in St. Mark's, in Venice, others wreathed about, as that at St. Dyonis near Paris, with anfractuous spires, and cocleary turnings about it, which probably is the effect of age, those wreaths being but the wrinkles of most vivacious unicorns.
Fuller. Worthies. London.

Behind the drum are several vaults and anfractuous cavities in the ear-bone, filled only with what naturalists call the implanted air, so to intend the least sound imaginable, that the sense might be affected with it.

ANGARIA'TION. Angario, which Vossius and Du Cange derive from the Gr. Αγγαρευειν, from αγγαρος, one sent; compelled to go. Quicunque te angariaverit milliare unum,—is rendered by Wiclif, "Whoever constreyneth the a thousand paces," (Mat. v. 42.) Modern version, "Whoever shall compel thee to go." It appears a favourite word with Bishop Hall, to denote—Effort, exertion; forceful exertion.

The popes continual angariations and extortions, under colour also of the Turkish warres, kept these men [the Popes' Merchants] still in vse here in England, to the extreame beggering of infinite numbers.
Speed. Hist. of Great Britain, an. 1235.

But if, in these earthly angariations, one mile, according to our Saviour's counsel, may bring on another; yet, in spiritual evil ways, no compulsion can prevail upon a resolved spirit.—Bp. Hall. Temptations Repelled.

No, my beloved: this leading of God's spirit must neither be a forced angariation, as if God would feoff grace and salvation upon us against our wills; nor some sudden protrusion to good; nor a mere, actual, momentary, transient, conduction.—Id. Ser. 40.

A'NGEL, n. A'NGEL, adj. ANGE'LICAL. ANGE'LICK. A'RCHANGEL. } Fr. Ange; It. Angelo; Sp. Angelo; Lat. Angelus; Gr. Αγγελος, nuncius, any one sent, a messenger.

Applied particularly to the messengers of God:—(in A. S. Godes arend-gast, i. e. God's Errand Ghost,) and sometimes to those of the devil. The adj. to that which, partaking of the nature of good Angels, is—

Exquisitely beautiful, or lovely.

Angels are spirits immaterial and intellectuall, the glorious inhabitants of those sacred pallaces, where nothing but light and blessed immortalitie, no shadow of matter for teares, discontentments, griefes, and uncomfortable passions to worke vpon, but all ioy, tranquillitie and peace, euen for euer and euer doe dwell.
Hooker. Eccles. Politie, b. i. § 4.

Oh speake againe bright angell, for thou art

When thou, attended gloriously from heaven,

The summoning arch-angels to proclaim
Thy dread tribunal: forthwith from all winds
The living, and forthwith the cited dead

Angelical actions may be reduced unto these three general kinds: first, most delectable love; secondly, adoration; thirdly, imitation.—Hooker. Eccles. Politie, b. i. § 4.

The ancient Hebrews (as we learn from Nachmonides) styled it [the Resurrection body] the angelical clothing of the soul, and Tertullian himself, angelificatum carnem, angelified flesh.—Cudworth. Intell. System, p. 797.

That there are such beings in the regions above us, as we call angels; i. e. certain permanent substances, invisible, and imperceptible to our senses, endowed with understanding and power, superior to that of human nature, created by and subject to God the Supreme Being, and ministering to divine providence in the government of the world, and therein especially of the affairs of men, is most certain from the Holy Scriptures. The very heathen philosophers confessed the existence of angels, although they called them by other names, as demons, genuses, or the like.
Bull, vol i. Ser 11.

There frequent, at the visionary hour,
When musing midnight reigns or silent noon,
Angelic harps are in full concert heard.—Thomson. Sum

A'NGER, v. A'NGRE, n. A'NGERLY. A'NGRY. A'NGERLY. } Perhaps (says Skinner) from the A. S. Ange, vexed, troubled; and this Ange, as well as the Gr. Αγχειν, and the Lat. Angere, Wachter derives from the German Eng, arctus, constrictus. The A. S. Ange, or Enge, appears to mean, Angustia, straitness. Ang-breost is interpreted by Somner, a contraction or straitness of the breast, q. d. confined, straitened in the breast. Angaria, in the Mid-Latin, was used (Du Cange) for any vexation, trouble, distress, or anxiety of mind. So Anger, in our old writers, was applied to—

Any vexation, or distress, or uneasiness of mind or body; though now (used of the mind) commonly (but not always) restricted to—

Those sensations (sc. of vexation, &c.) when caused by the conduct of another, and accompanied by a desire to retaliate or punish (See IRE, and the quotation from Tillotson); and may thus be distinguished from anguish and anxiety. Applied to the body, it still retains the ancient usage. From an ancient Hymn to the Virgin in MS. Warton cites "Heyl. innocent of angerness," (vol. i. p. 315.)

Wenne ich ne may have the maistre, suche melancholie ich take that ich catche the crampe. the cardiacle som tyme. other an ague in suche an angre.—Piers Ploughman, p. 91.

Now swete sir, is it your ease

Alas, what may it you auaunce
To doen to him so great greuaunce.
Chaucer. Rom. of the Rose.

She saied, Daunger great wrong ye doe

It is to you great villanie. Id. 15.

That he whiche erst a man was formed,

It is a great perfection not to be moued with angre, but in case there were in vs a frailty of nature any rage of angre come in your mind remember as ye holy patriographe geueth warning vs to restrayn your angre, whan it would barst out, that it breake not out into scolding, or iniurie, or malicious hatred.—Good Fyuetyme, c. 4.

And for so muche as ye thynke your selues to bee wyse, I will anger you with a kynde of people, whiche in your iudgement is foolyshe and beastlye, thereby to make you more enuious.—Id. Rem. c. 10.

For an angrie man kindleth variaunce, and the vngodly disquieteth frendes, and putteth discorde amonge them that be at peace.—Bible, 1551. Syrach, c 28.

Aswin told him [William II.] your grace may have me and all that is mine, to serve your turn in a friendly manner but in the way of seruitude and bondage you shall neither have me nor mine. which words so angred the king, that they could never after be reconciled.—Baker. Chron.

They have their several sounds and notes of expression, whereby they can signify their dislike and anger: but only man can cloathe his angry thoughts with words of offence, as that faculty, which was given him for an advantage, is depraved to a further mischief.—Bp. Hall. Balm of Gil.

Nay heare me Hubert, driue these men away,
And I will sit as quiet as a lambe
I will not stirre, nor winch, nor speake a word,
Nor looke vpon the iron angerly.
Shakespeare. K. John, Act iv. sc. 1.

When having given express command that none

Daniel. Civil War, b ii.

It angerd Turenne, once upon a day,
To see a footman kick'd, that took his pay.
But when he heard the affront the fellow gave,
Knew one a man of honour, one a knave,
The prudent general turned it to a jest,
And begg'd he'd take the pains to kick the rest.
Pope. Epil. to Satires.

Anger is a short fit of madness, and [he] that is passionate and furious deprives himself of his reason, spoils his understanding, and helps to make himself a fool; whereas he that conquers his passions and keeps them under, doth thereby preserve and improve his understanding Tillotson. Works, vol. i. Ser. 4.

But when his foe lies prostrate on the plain,
He sheaths his paws, unsheds his angry mane,
And pleased with bloodless honours of the day,
Walks over and disdains th' inglorious prey.
Dryden. Hind and Panther.

Anger is the strong passion or emotion, impressed or excited by a sense of injury received, or in contemplation; that is, in the idea of something of a pernicious nature and tendency being done or intended, in violation of some supposed obligation to a contrary conduct Cogan. On the Passions, vol. i. p. 113.

A'NGLE, v. } D. and Ger. Anghel, Hangel;
A'NGLE, n. } A. S. Angel; Hamus, an hook,

A'NGLING, n. } the Ger. Anken, figere, to fix, to pierce. Skinner inclines to the verb, To Hang. And Minshew to the D. Anghel, or Hanghel, from Hanghen, to hang. To Angle then will mean—

To hang out (sc.) a bait, allurement, snare, entanglement; and, consequentially, to allure, to ensnare, to entice, to delude.

B. Jonson writes Englde, and applies the noun to one who has been, or may be allured, ensnared, entangled, deluded. Shakespeare uses Angle, in the same manner.

It seemeth he hath to loners enmite
And was a traitor, as men may all day se

Boy. O master, master, I have watcht so long,

Shakespeare. Tam. of the Shrew, Act iv. sc. 5.

3 Child. I would speak with your author, where is he?
2 Child. Not this way, I assure you, sir, we are not so officiously befriended by him, as to have his presence in the tiring-house, to prompt us aloud, stamp at the book-holder, swear for our properties, curse the poor fireman, ran the music out of tune, and sweat for every venial trespass we commit, as some author would, if he had such fine enghles as we.—B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revels. Ind.

What! shall I have my son a stager now! an enghle for players! a gull, a rook, a shot clog, to make suppers, and be laughed at? Publius, I will set thee on the funeral pile first.—Id. Poetaster, Act i. sc. 1.

And fell so loudly to a large confession,
To angle for your thoughts.
Shakespeare. Troil. & Cres. Act III. sc. 2.

Yet now near-hand cannot resist no more?—Bp. Hall, Sat. 5.

The ladies, angling in the crystal lake,

Dryden. Pref. to Troil. & Cres.

The same place and powers, which Y had in the Greek language, he [the letter U] stood fully intitled to in the English, and that therefore of right he ought to be possessed of the place of Y, even in all Greek words anglicised.

If the two houses of parliament, or either of them, had avowedly a right to animadvert on the king, or each other, or if the king had a right to animadvert on either of the houses, that branch of the legislature, so subject to animadversion, would instantly cease to be part of the supreme power.—*Blackstone. Man hath his daily work of body or mind
Appointed, which declares his dignity,
And the regard of heaven on all his ways;
While other animals inactive range,
And of their doings God takes no account.—Id. Ib. b iv.

No man can perish for being an animal man, that is, for not having any supernatural revelations, but for not consenting to them when he hath, that is, for being carnal as well as animal, and that he is carnal is wholly his own choice. In the state of animality he cannot go to heaven; but neither will that alone bear him to hell.
Bp. Taylor. Of Repentance, c. 6. s. 2.

The body is one, not only by the continuity of all the parts held together with the same natural ligaments and covered with one and the same skin, but much more by the animation of the same soul quickening the whole frame.

For these effluctions penetrate all bodies, and like the species of visible objects are ever ready in the medium, and lay hold on all bodies proportionate or capable of their action: those bodies likewise being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their motion, and if not fettered by their gravity, conform themselves to situations, wherein they best unite unto their animator

Pope. Temple of Fame.

Animate bodies are either such as are endued with a vegetative soul, as plants; or a sensitive soul, as the bodies of animals, birds, beasts, fishes, and insects; or a rational soul, as the body of man, and the vehicles of angels, if any such there be.—Ray. On the Creation.

How near of kin soever they may seem to be, and how certain soever it is, that man is an animal, or rational, or white, yet every one at first hearing perceives the falsehood of these propositions; humanity is animality, or rationality, or whiteness.—Locke. On Hum. Underst. b iii. c 8.

Would the polite Egyptian priests, who first animalized the asterisms, do, like Tom Otter in the comedy, bring their bulls and bears to court? would they exalt them into heaven, before they had made any considerable figure upon earth! the fact is indeed just otherwise

Jo. Hall. Letter of Apology

You shall hear them pretending to bewail the animosities kept up between the Church of England and Dissenters, where the differences in opinion are so few and inconsiderable, yet these very sons of moderation were pleased to excommunicate every man, who disagreed with them in the smallest article of their political creed.—Examiner, No. 19.

What can be imagined more trivial than the difference between one colour of livery and another in horse races? Yet this difference begat two most inveterate factions in the Greek empire, the PRASINI and VENETI, who never suspended their animosities till they ruined that unhappy government.—Hume, pt. I. The next circumstance which I shall mention, under this head of muscular arrangement, is so decisive a mark of intention, that it always appeared to me, to supersede, in some measure, the necessity of seeking for any other observation upon the subject: and that circumstance is, the tendons, which pass from the leg to the foot, being bound down by a ligament at the ancle.—*Paley. The picture of the Creator, or God the Father, in the shape of an old man, is a dangerous piece, and in this fecundity of sects may revive the Anthropomorphites.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 21.

Nor need any wonder how it [tradition of præ-existence] came at length to be lost, or at least kept but from a few, who considers the grossness of succeeding ages, when such multitudes could swallow the dull and coarse Anthropomorphite doctrines.—Glanville. Pre-existence of Souls, c. 4.

We are not to conceive of God as having a body, or any corporeal shape or members. This was the gross conceit of the Anthropomorphites of old, and of some Socinians of late, which they ground upon the gross and literal interpretation of many figurative speeches in Scripture concerning God, as where it speaks of his face, hand, and arm, &c.

Some fetch the original of this proverb ("he looks as the devil over Lincoln") from a stone picture of the devil, which doth (or lately did) overlook Lincoln-College. The last quære remains, of the virtue of this [unicorn's] horn, which some exalt so high, that it is not only antidotal to several venomes and substances destructive by their qualities, which we can command ourselves to believe; but also that it resisteth poysons which kill by second qualities, that is, by corrosion of parts.—Fuller. Worthies. London.

Nor could Alexander himself, at the price of all his conquests, antidote, or recall the poisonous draught, when it had once got into his veins.—South, vol. iv. Ser. 12.

To say that, without a vicious luxury, the labour would not have been employed at all, is only to say, that there is some other defect in human nature, such as indolence, selfishness, inattention to others, for which luxury, in some measure, provides a remedy; as one poison may be an antidote to another.—Hume. Essays, pt. ii. Ess. 2.

A'NTIMASQUE. Perhaps a masque: a second or secondary masque, to succeed and correspond with the principal.

Let Anti-masques not be long; they have beene common of fooles, satyrs, &c. As for Angels, it is not comical enough to put them in Anti-masques. And any thing that is hideous, as Devils, giants, is on the other side as unfit. but chiefly let the Musicke of them be recreative, and with some strange changes.—Bacon. Ess. Of Masques & Triumphs.

Milton. Doct. and Dis. of Divorce, b. ii. c. 3.

A man cannot do a greater despite to the Christian religion, nor take a more effectual course to bring it into contempt, and to make it be hiss'd out of the world, than to represent it as a lewd and licentious doctrine, which gives men a perfect discharge from all the duties of morality, and obligeth them only to believe confidently, that Christ hath purchased for them a liberty to do what they will, and that upon these terms, and no other, they are secured of the favour of God in this world, and eternal salvation in the other. This is the sum and plain result of the Antinomian doctrine.—Tillotson, vol. ii. ser. 50.

That doctrine that holds that the covenant of grace is not established upon conditions, and that nothing of performance is required on man's part to give him an interest in it, but only to believe that he is justified, this certainly subverts all the motives of a good life. But this is the doctrine of the Antinomians.—South, vol. vii. Ser. 5.

It may be truly affirmed, that there is no society of Christians in the world, where Antinomianism and Libertinism more reign, than among the Papists, into whose faith they are interwoven, and men are taught them by the definitions of their church.—Bp. Bull, vol. i. Ser. 1.

Great offenders this way are the libertines and Antinomists, who quite cancel the whole law of God, under the pretence of Christian liberty.—Bp. Sanderson. Ser. p. 310.

ANTI'STROPHE. Gr. Αντιστροφη, from Αντιστρεφ-ειν, to turn again. See the quotation.

It was customary, on some occasions, to dance round the altars, whilst they sang the sacred hymns, which consisted of three stanzas or parts; the first of which, called strophe, was sung in turning from east to west; the other named antistrophe, in returning from west to east: then they stood before the altar, and sung the epode, which was the last part of the song.—*Potter. ANTI'THESIS. ANTITHE'TICAL. } Fr. Antithese; It. Antitesi; Sp. Antithesis; Lat. Antithesis; Gr. Αντιθεσις, opposition, (αντι, against, opposed to, and θεσις, place or position.) Tindale has, what he calls, "A pretye Antithesis between the Pope's Churche and Christe's little Flock," (Workes, p. 292. Margin.) We should say, Contrast. See the quotation from Blair.

This epithet of the Church to be the pillar and ground of truth is to be understood, to signifie in opposition to all religions that were not Christian; the implied antithesis is not of the whole to its parts, but of kind to kind.

Bp. Taylor. Dissuasive from Popery, b. i. pt. ii. s. 1.

A'NTITYPE. ANTITY'PICAL. ANTITY'POUS. } Fr. Antitype; Sp. Antitypo; Gr. Αντιτυπον, from αντι, denoting correspondency, and τυπος, a form, or figure. (See Parkhurst, also TYPE.) Our version of Heb. ix. is, Patterns, and in 1 Pet. iii. Figure. The latter, Parkhurst explains, Antitypical, or an Antitype—

"Somewhat answering to, and represented by, a type, or emblem."

And Delpino—

"That which is resembled or shadowed out by the type."

Christ said not, this is the type of my body, but it is it. But, however, this new question began to branle the words of type and antitype, and the manner of speaking began to be changed, yet the article as yet was not changed. For the Fathers used the words of type and antitype, and image, &c. to exclude the natural sence of the sacramental body: and Damascene, and Anastasius Sinaita, and some others of that age, began to refuse those words, lest the sacrament be thought to be nothing of reality, nothing but an image.

Bp. Taylor. Of the Real Presence, s. 12, § 28.

Atterbury, vol. i. Ser. 4.

We conceive that the first heads of being ought rather to be expressed thus: Resisting or antitypous extension, and life (i. e. internal energy and self-activity); and then again, that life or internal self-activity, is to be subdivided into such as either acts with express consciousness, or synæsthesis, or such as is without it.

Cudworth. Intell. System, p. 159.

A'NTLER. A'NTLERED. } Fr. Andoillier, Antoillier, Endouiller. The brow anklers, or first branch of a deer's head, (Cotgrave.) Antoillier, the French etymologists seem willing to derive from the Latin Ante, before. May it not be compounded of En and Douille, which, Cotgrave says, is a socket, (it is perhaps a diminutive of Tuyau,—see TUBILL.) Our own word, Antler, for which no very old authorities have been found, may be a corruption of Ankler, and this be from Hank. See ANKLE.

When they grow old, they grow less branched, and first do lose their brow antlers or lowest furcations next the head.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 9.

A'NTRE. Fr. Antre; It. Antro; Lat. Antrum; a cave or den.

——— Of my redemption thence,
And portance in my traueilours historie,
Wherein of antars vast, and desarts idle,
Rough quarries, rocks, hills, whose head touch heaven,
It was my hint to speake.—Shakes. Othello, Act i. sc. 3.

A'NVIL. A'NVILLED. } Ger. Anbold; D. Æn-beld, that on which any thing is formed (beaten into form); in A. S. Anfilt, the b changed into f; but Skinner derives from Æn, on, and feallan, to fall, because the hammer frequently falls upon the anvil, and the anvil is exposed to the frequent blows of the hammer. Wachter, Ger. Fillen, cædere, to strike. An anvil is—

A solid mass upon which metals are beaten or prepared for use, are formed or fashioned for use:—

Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. I. c. 12.

—— Allegiance
Tempted too far is like the trial of
A good sword on an anuil; as that often
Flies in pieces without service to the owner;
So trust enforced too far proves treachery,
And is too late repented

ANXIETY. A'NXIOUS. A'NXIOUSLY. A'NXIOUSNESS. } Fr. Anxiété: It. Ansietà; Sp. Ansia; immediately from the Latin, Anxietas, from Angere, which Vossius derives from the Greek Αγχειν, to strangle, to suffocate. The German has Angst. Joy several times uses anxt.

Anxiety, anguish, and anger, appear to have the same ultimate origin. See ANGUISH and ANGER.

Anxiety is always used, where some degree of uncertainty exists; and is applied to—

The painfulness arising from doubt, uncertainty, perplexity; to an eager desire, or solicitude, where the result is not certain.

I know a lady so given up to this sort of devotion, that though she employs six or eight hours of the twenty four at cards, she never misses one canonical hour of prayer, for which time another holds her cards, to which she returns with no little anxiousness till two or three in the morning.

And taking the whole of the collection together, it is an unquestionable truth that there is no one book extant, in any language, or in any country, which can in any degree be compared with it for antiquity, for authority, for the importance, the dignity, the variety, and the curiosity of the matter it contains.—Porteus, Lect. 1.

A'ORIST. Gr. Αοριστος, (α, not, without; and ορος, a bound or limit,) unbounded, undefined, indefinite. Applied to a grammatical distribution of tenses. See the quotation.

The tenses are used to mark present, past, and future time, either indefinitely without reference to any beginning, middle, or end; or else definitely in reference to such distinctions. If indefinitely, then we have three tenses, an aorist of the present, an aorist of the past, and an aorist of the future.—Harris. Hermes, b. i. c. 7.

APAGO'GICAL. Gr. Απαγωγη, from απο, and αγειν, to draw, or lead away.

The application of this word in dialectics may be seen in the citation from Beattie.

If this be not admitted, I demand a reason why any other apagogical demonstration, or demonstration ad absurdum, should be admitted in geometry rather than this.
Berkeley. Analyst, § 25.

There are two sorts of mathematical demonstration. The one is called direct, and takes place when a conclusion is inferred from principles which render it necessarily true; and this, though a more perfect or more simple sort of proof, is not more convincing than the other; which is called indirect, apagogical, reducens ad absurdum, and which takes place, when by supposing a given proposition false, we are necessarily led into absurdity

Soon after, a handsome apologetical letter was sent from the vice-chancellor to sir W. Julius Cæsar did write a collection of apophthegms, as appears in an epistle of Cicero; so did Macrobius, a consular man.—I need say no more for the worth of a writing of that nature.—Certainly they are of excellent use. Cicero prettily calleth them salinas, salt-pits, that you may extract salt out of, and sprinkle it where you will. They serve to be interlaced in continued speech. They serve to be recited upon occasion of themselves. They serve, if you take out the kernel of them, and make them your own.

That the church of Rome is itself; that is, a church, that it is visible, that it is truly existent, there can be no doubt: but is it still a part of the truly existent visible church of Christ? Surely, no otherwise than a heretical and apostatical church is and may be.—Id. Reconciler.

As force is inconsistent with the nature of religion in general, and still more opposite to the spirit of Christianity in particular, so it is in Scripture, still further, made the distinguishing character of the great apostacy foretold by Christ and his Apostles.—Clarke, vol. i. Ser. 114.

Matth.* c. 14.

That I so am, [a minister of Christ] I declared neither with high loke, nor with taking of presentes, nor by bragging of my kindred, but by suche meanes as euidētly proued mine apostolique spirit.—Id. 2 Cor. c. 11.

Although deacons and priests have part of these offices, and therefore (though in a very limited sense) they may be called successores Apostolorum, to wit, in the power of baptizing, consecrating the Eucharist, and preaching, yet the Apostolate and Episcopacy, which did communicate in all the power, and offices which are ordinary and perpetual, are in Scripture clearly all one in ordinary ministration.

Bp. Taylor. Episcopacy Asserted, s. 4.

"You know, brother, [says Mr. Calvin,] that the fashion is otherwise with us: I bear with it because it is not profitable to contend" a charitable rule, and worthy to be universal; and indeed little other than apostolical.

Bp. Hall. Peace-Maker.

He that is rightly and apostolically sped with her [the churches] invisible arrow, if he can be at peace in his soul, and not smell within him the brimstone of hell, may have fair leave to tell all his bags over undiminished of the least farthing.—Milton. Ref. in England.

He undertakes to conclude,—1. The right of the papacy to supreme universal monarchy. 2. The infallibility and apostolicalness of every article of the modern Roman faith, and both these with that irrefragable evidence of conviction, that belongs to grounds.—Hammond. Works, vol. ii. p. 190.

'Tis well worth remarking upon this place, that the promise, ye shall sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel, was made to the Apostles at that time when Judas was yet one of that number; and consequently, the promise was as much made to him as to any of the rest. From whence it follows undeniably, that he was not predestinated necessarily to be a traitor, but fell from his Apostleship, and from his right to this promise, by his after-voluntary transgression.—Clarke, vol. ii. Ser. 138.

Last, in the papal standard, they display
The triple crown, and apostolic key;
Sev'n thousand valiant Romans march behind,
And great Camillo had the charge assign'd.

Having no general apostolical mission, being a citizen of a particular state, and being bound up, in a considerable degree, by its public will, I should think it, at least, improper and irregular, for me to open a formal public correspondence with the actual government of a foreign nation.

Burke. On the French Revolution.

APO'STROPHE. } Fr. Apostropher; It. Apostrofo; Sp. Apostrofe; Lat. Apostrophe; Gr. Αποστροφη, aversio, from αποστρεφω, to turn away; (απο, and στρεφω, to turn.) See the quotation from Beattie.
APO'STROPHIZE.
APO'STROPHICK.

The construction of words; whereunto apostrophus, an affection of words coupled and joined together, doth belong. Apostrophus is the rejecting of a vowel from the beginning or ending of a word.—B. Jonson. English Gram. b. ii. c. 1

There is a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apostrophizing Eumæus, and speaking of him in the second person, it is generally applied only to men of account and distinction.

Pope. Homer. Odyssey, b. xiv. v. 41. Note.

How absurd would it appear, in our temperate and calm speakers, to make use of an apostrophe, like that noble one of Demosthenes, so much celebrated by Quintilian and Longinus, when justifying the unsuccessful battle of Chæronea, he breaks out, "No, my fellow-citizens, no; you have not erred. I swear by the manes of those heroes, who fought for the same cause in the plains of Marathon and Platæa."—Hume. Ess. On Eloquence.

Apostrophe is a sudden change in our discourse; when, without giving previous notice, we address ourselves to a person or thing different from that to which we were addressing ourselves before.

Beattie. Elements of Moral Science, pt. iv. c. 1.

Sometimes when the singular terminates in s, the apostrophic s is not added: as for goodness' sake.

To decay, to droop, to wither. And, also—
To terrify, to dismay.
See AMAZE for an example from Shakespeare.

Striding, and brandishing his massy spear.
Him [Ajax] view'd the Greeks exulting; with appal
The Trojans; and with palpitating heart
Ev'n Hector. Cowper. Homer. Iliad, b. vi.

A'PPANAGE. Fr. Apanage, Appannage, Appennage; Law Lat. Appenagium, Appanagium. Menage and Caseneuve have written fully upon the origin of this word. Spelman favours the opinion, that Pana-gium is from Panis; or, if the word is properly written, Appenagium, he is inclined to believe it formed Ab, appendendo, quasi Appendagium junioris filii.

Age, the termination (Lat. Agium), he suggests, may be from Ag-ere, signifying, in composition, Actus, exhibitio, vel ministerium rei; Aquagium, he adds, from Festus, quasi Aquæ agium, id est, Aquæ ductus. In like manner, Homagium, actus vel ministerium hominis. Terragium, tributum quod terræ agit, hoc est exhibet. The root is not improbably the same A.S. Ec, eac, ac, (see AGE), denoting something added, put to or upon, imposed; charged upon.

Our old law language abounds with words in this termination. Wallis thinks we have it immediately from the Latin termination atio. See AVERAGE, BEACONAGE, &c. &c.—Appanage is,

The portion of a younger brother in France: lands, &c. assigned to younger sons, or brethren. See further in Cotgrave and Spelman. Lord Bacon calls the earldom of Chester a kind of appanage to Wales, which used to go to the king's son. Swift uses the word metaphorically.

With Pæan's purest fire his favourites glow,
The dregs will serve to ripen ore below;
His meanest work for, had he thought it fit
That wealth should be the appannage of wit,
The God of light could ne'er have been so blind,
To deal it to the worst of human kind.

Swift. Ep. to Mr. Gay, 1731.

It seems rather probable, that these Persian Magi did, in their Arimanius, either personate evil only, as we suppose the Egyptians to have done in Typhon; or else understand a satanical power by it: notwithstanding which, they might possibly sacrifice thereunto (as the Greeks did to evil demons) for its appeasement and mitigation.

This philosopher [Leibnitz] makes a distinction between perception and what he calls apperception. The first is common to all monads, the last proper to the higher orders, among which are human souls. By apperception he understands that degree of perception which reflects, as it were, upon itself, by which we are conscious of our own existence, and conscious of our perceptions, by which we can reflect upon the operation of our own minds, and can comprehend abstract truths.—Reid, Ess. 2. c. 15.

The will therefore is that other great faculty of the reasonable soul, and it is not a bare appetitive power as that of the sensual appetite, but is a rational appetite, and is considerable.—Id. Ib. p. 58.

And the reason of this is, because all good, as such as in its degree a proper object for the will to choose; and whatsoever is a proper object of its choice is also sufficient to draw forth, and determine the actings of it, unless there interpose some stronger appetible, to rival or overmatch it in its choice.—South, vol. iv. Over the appetites and passions themselves, they [brutes] have no government; no moral judgment or discernment of the difference of good and evil; no superiour light or direction, by which to suppress a hurtful appetite, or over-rule the instincts of passion, and therefore are not at all accountable for any things they do.—Clarke, vol. i. Pro. Here is her hand, the agent of her heart;
Here is her oath for loue, her honour's paune;
O that our fathers would applaud our loues,
To seale our happinesse with their consents!
Shakespeare. Two Gentlemen of Verona, Act ii. sc. 3.

And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude, honest perhaps, though over timorous, of them that vex in this behalf, but shall laugh in the end at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.—Milton. Areopagitica.

Brut. Another generall shout!

A'PPLE. A. S. Æpl, æppel, æpple; D. Appel; Ger. Apfel. Wachter seems most worthy of attention; he conjectures that the word has reference to roundness; ab intensivo A. and bal, bol, rotundus, quasi fructum, valde rotundum. The reason of this opinion is, that all the dialects call all round fruits by this name, etiamsi poma non sint. The apple of the eye, he considers to be so called from its roundness. See APFEL, in Wachter.

To apple, i. e. to form into a ball, is a common term in gardening.

So that me thought it for the best
To hir and yafe the apple tho.—Gower. Con. A. b. v.

Together with my lady's fortune fell; and of her gentleman-usher I became her apple-squire, to hold the door, and keep centinel at taverns.—Nabbes. Microcosmus, Act v.

To satisfy the sharp desire I had
Of tasting those fair apples, I resolv'd
Not to defer; hunger and thirst at once,
Powerful persuaders, quicken'd at the scent

Among many other thinges in this king [Hen. Grafton. Hen. II. an. 30.

If any one shall look upon this [five] as a stable number, and fitly appropriable unto trees, as bodies of rest and station, he hath herein a great foundation in nature, who observing much variety in legges and motive organs of animals, as two, four, six, eight, twelve, fourteen, and more, hath passed over five and ten, and assigned them unto none, or very few.—*Brown. In old times, whilst these churches were in the clergy-hand, they were called appropriations, because they were appropriate to a particular succession of church men: now they are called impropriations, for they are improperly in the hands of lay-men.—Spelman. On Tithes, p. 137.

Spelman. On Tithes, p. 141

And surely the Bible's being appropriate (as itself tells us) to enlighten the eyes and to make wise the simple; and it being written for the use of the whole people of God, whereof the greater number are no clerks, things are there expressed with an evidence proportionable to the degree of assent that they exact, and are so far forth intelligible to pious and industrious readers, as they are necessary to be understood by them.—Boyle. Works, vol. ii. p. 267.

Not only a simple heterodox, but a very hard paradox, it will seem, and of great absurdity unto obstinate ears, if we say attraction is unjustly appropriated unto the loadstone, and that perhaps we speak not properly, when we say vulgarly and appropriately the loadstone draweth iron; and yet herein we should not want experiment and great authority.—Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. ii. c. 3.

To question thy bold entrance on this place?"
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. iv.

A testimony is of small validity if deduced from men out of their own profession; so if Lactantius affirm the figure of the earth is plain, or Austin himself deny there are Antipodes; though venerable fathers of the church, and ever to be honoured, yet will not their authorities prove sufficient to ground a belief thereon. Whereas, notwithstanding solid reason or confirmed experience of any man, is very approvable in what profession soever.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. i. c. 7.

It is lawful, in short, as our Saviour expresses it, to do well on the sabbath-day; to preserve ourselves, and to benefit our fellow-creatures. Thus far then we may go, but no farther. In other respects, the rest of the Lord's day is to be observed; and those very exceptions which our Saviour makes, are a proof, that in every other case he approves and sanctions the duty of resting on the sabbath-day.
Porteus, vol. i. Lect. 10.

But there is another species of confession, which we read much of in our antient books, of a far more complicated kind, which is called approvement. And that is, when a person, indicted of treason or felony, and arraigned for the same, doth confess the fact before plea pleaded, and appeals or accuses others, his accomplices, in the same crime; in order to obtain his pardon. In this case he is called an approver or prover, and the party appealed or accused is called the appellee. Such approvement can only be in capital offences.—*Blackstone. A'RBOUR, n. A'rbour, v. } Commonly derived from Arbor, a tree. Dr. T. H. (in Skinner) thinks it is Air-bower. And Skinner himself (since Chaucer and others write it Herber,) that it is from the A. S. Herberga, Mansio, from Herebergan, Herebyrigan, to harbour. See Harbour and Herber.

Arbour, is usually applied to a place of retirement in gardens or pleasure grounds formed of trees for shade or shelter. Compare the quotations from Chaucer and Dryden.

And so I followed till it me brought
To right a pleasaunt herber well ywrought
That benched was and with turfes new Freshly turned whereof the greene gras
So small, so thicke, so short, so fresh of hew
That most like vnto green wel wot I it was
The hegge also that yede in compas
And closed in all the green herbere
With sicamour was set and eglatere.
Chaucer. The Floure & the Leafe.

At last it led me where an arbour stood,
The sacred receptacle of the wood:—
'Twas bench'd with turf, and goodly to be seen,
The thick young grass arose in fresher green:
The mound was newly made, no sight cou'd pass
Betwixt the nice partitions of the grass;
The well-united sods so closely lay;
And all around the shades defended it from day,
For sycamours with eglantine were spread,
A hedge about the sides, a covering over head.—Dryden.

There is one difference above all others between visibles and audibles, that is the most remarkable, as that whereupon many smaller differences do depend namely, that visibles, except lights, are carried in right lines, and audibles in arcuate lines.—Bacon. Nat. Hist. § 270.

But the cause of the confusion in sounds, and the inconfusion in species visible; is, for that the sight worketh in right lines, and maketh severall cones: and so there can be no coincidence in the ele, or visuall point: but sounds that move in oblique and arcuate lines, must needs encounter, and disturb the one the other.—Id. Ib. § 224.

So 'tis no wonder when it hath descended

It is also very remarkable which Casper Bartholine hath observed in the gullet, that where it perforateth the midriff, the carneous fibres of that muscular part are inflected and arcuate.—Ray. On the Creation, pt. ii.

Yet shall (my lord) your just, your noble rules

And now from this short and transient view of the architectonick faculty of animals, especially the irrationals, we may easily perceive some superiour and wise being was certainly concerned in the creation or original. And therefore these curious medlers in collecting and gathering together on all sides the errours, defaults, and solœcismes (as I may so say), not of verses or poems, but of other men's lives, make of their memory a most unpleasant archive or register, and uncivill record which they ever carry about them.—*Holland. Burning, heating; hot, fiery; having the violence of fire; and therefore violent, vehement, passionate, eager, fierce.

Ardour is applied, by Milton, to the sentient being.

For if he bee ardaunt in auarice, and that he be a raueinour by violence of foraine richesse, thou shalt saine that he is like a wolfe.—Chaucer. Boecius, b. iv.

Ever the greter merite shall he have that most restreineth the wicked enchauling or ardure of this sinne.

Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

The ardency in Christ was sincere ardency, accompanied with acts of love and trust of the same temper; and the heightning it was an addition of degrees to that act of ardency, and so of prayer, and proportionably of love and trust in God, above either what there was, or what there was occasion for at other times.
Hammond. Degrees of Ardency in Christ's Prayer.

By how much heat any one receives externally from the ardency of the sun, his internal heat is proportionably abated.—Sir T. Herbert. Travels, p. 27.

——— Nor delaid the winged saint,
After his charge receiv'd; but from among Thousand celestial ardors, where he stood

False is that which is commonly reported of Democritus the philosopher: namely, that willingly he dimmed and quenched (as it were) his own sight, by fixing his eyes fast upon a fiery and ardent mirror.—Holland. Plutarch, p. 117.

Not far behind, a knight of swarthy face,
High on a coal black steed pursu'd the chace;
With flashing flames his ardent eyes were fill'd,
And in his hands a naked sword he held.
Dryden. Theodore & Honoria.

And therefore it is very possible to be too devout, not because any expression of seraphic love can be made with too much ardency, whilst it is considered abstractedly in itself, and irrelatively to the rest; but because that there being several duties of love, which require an ardency of it, it is injurious to exercise all that in one alone, or a few, that belongs equally to the neglected others.
Boyle. Works, vol. i. p. 274

A'RDUOUS. It. Arduo; Sp. Arduo; Lat. Arduus, which Vossius thinks is from Ardere, because, like flame and things burning (our ardent) it directs its course to things aloft. The word appears quite modern in English usage.

ARE. } An attempt must be made to ac-
ART. } count for this word, commonly called an auxiliary verb, and the plural of the present tense of the verb to be. It seems very probable that the primitive meaning is front or fore:—The front part of the body, as opposed to the hind or back. In Goth. Air; A. S. Er, is prius, ante, before. In Gr. εαρ, ηρ, is the fore or early part of the year or day, the spring, the morning. We then find that the A. S. Ar, Are, D. Eere, is used to denote honour, and the V. in A. S. Ar-ian; D. Eer-en; Ger. Er-en; Sw. Ær-a, to honour; i. e. to put or place forward, before others, to advance, to prefer. In Sw. Ara, is a messenger, an errand, or arrand-bearer, one sent forth or forward; and the Ger. Er-en is also to bear or carry an errand. Hence there seems no violence in the inference that—

Are is—To stand forward, to stand forth, to put or place forward or forth; —to exist, (ex-sistere, ex-stare.)

Art, A. S. Eart, is Ared, Ar'd, Art, now restricted to the second person singular. The regular plural of Are is Ar-en: it has been long used without the termination. Wiclif commonly uses ben, i. e. be-en in all the persons plural.

A'REA, from Lat. Arere, to dry (Vossius). An area is a place where corn, when reaped, may be thrashed and dried.

Open places in a city are, (Varro,) and more generally any open, though bounden space, is, so called.

In a room contriv'd for state, the height of the roof shou'd bear a proportion to the area.—Dryden. Ded. to Span. Fryar.

Let us conceive a floor or area of goodly length, (for example, at least of 120 foot) with the breadth somewhat more than the half of the longitude.
Wotton. Reliquiæ, p. 45.

There is something very noble in it, tho' the high wall and corridors that went round it are almost entirely ruined, and the area is quite filled up to the lower seat, which was formerly deep enough to let the spectators see in safety the combats of the wild beasts and gladiators.

ARE'TTE. In Bar. Lat. is found Arretare, the same, says Du Cange, as Retare, Rettare, for Rectare; to warn an accused person to do right (Rectum), to summon to justice. Arrette, says Skinner, seems to mean to censure, to estimate, from the Fr. Arrester, to judge. Tyrwhitt.—to impute to. The Gr. Λογιζομαι, is rendered by the Vulgate, Imputor, Reputor, and these by Wiclif Arette. Soldiers armed with guns, of whatsoever sort or denomination the latter, appear to have been called arquebusiers, though the weapon termed an arquebuse (originally a haque or haquebut), is distinguished by a particular description in dictionaries and glossaries. It is probable, however, that haques or harquebuses, anciently signified guns in general; in proof of which a gunsmith is still called in French an arquebusier. The strange alteration from harquebut to harquebuse may be gradually traced in these papers; where the bearers of the weapons in question are variously stiled, "hackbutters, or hagbutters, or harquebutliers," &c.; from haque, a term of unknown derivation, and buter, Fr. to aim at.—Lodge. Illustrations, vol. i. p. 238.

The particulars of this new arrogation of Rome are so many, that they cannot be pent up in a strait room. I only instance in some few. The Pope's infallibity of judgment.
Hall. The Old Religion, c. 17.

(I do) not see humility and self denyal, and acknowledgment of their own unworthiness of such things as they aimed at, nor mortification, not of the body (for that's sufficiently insisted upon) but of the more spiritual arrogative life of the soul, that subtill ascribing that to ourselves that is God's, for all is God's.—H. More. Song of the Soul. Notes annexed.

The half lettered are forward, and arrogate to themselves what a modest studious man dares not, though he knows more.—Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 3.

Arrogance is always offensive, because in demanding more than its due (for this meaning appears in the etymology of the word) it manifests a petulant and injurious disposition, that disdains to be controlled by good breeding or any other restraint.—Beattie. Moral Science, pt. i. c. 2.

Power, ability, skill, science, cunning. See SCIENCE.
Art and science may be distinguished thus:—Science is knowledge; art is power or skill in the use of knowledge: the art is the practical use of the science (e. g. of logick), of the principles of the science.

The best artist is he who uses the science, the principles of the science, with greatest practical skill and dexterity.

Artifice is now commonly applied where deception is intended. But see the quotation from Brown. And—

Artful, where an evil design is imputed.

Of arte he had the maistrie, he mad a corven kyng

Fabyan. Philip de Valoys, an. 1.

The mindes of the faithful shal be more refreshed, & filled wt this holsome foode, thus ministred by a simple person, then if ye superstitious Pharisey, the arrogant philosophier, or eloquent rhetorician, would for the aduauncyng and setting forthe of theselfes make vnto the people an artificial oracion or sermon, whiche they had diligently studied, & long time prouided for aforehand.—Udal. Mark, c. 6.

The sayde authour sayth also that the aforesaide Rosamond had a little coffer scarcely two foote long, meruelous artificially wrought, wherein gyauntes seeme to fight, beastes do startle and stirre, and fowles fliyng in the ayre, and fishes swim in the water, without any mannes mouyng or helpe.—*Grafton. Milton. Paradise Lost, b. i.

And Plato, in his Theætetus, noteth well, "That particulars are infinite, and the higher generalities give no sufficient direction, and that the pith of all sciences, which maketh the artizan differ from the inexpert, is in the middle propositions, which in every particular knowledge are taken from tradition and experience."—Bacon. Of Learning.

This, my lord, is the duchess Bianca, a wond'rous sweet picture, if you will observe with what singularity the artizan hath strove to set forth each limb in exquisitest proportion, not missing a hair.
Ford. Love's Sacrifice, Act ii. sc. 2.

But amongst all other things, he [Mark Antony] most wondered at the infinite number of lights and torches hanged on the top of the house, giving light in every place, so artificially set and ordered by devices, some round, some square that it was the rarest thing to behold that eye could discern, or that ever books could mention.
North. Plutarch, p. 763.

But till some genius as universal as Aristotle, shall arise, who can penetrate into all arts and sciences, without the practice of them, I shall think it reasonable that the judgment of an artificer in his own art, should be preferrable to the opinion of another man.—Dryden. Pref. to All for Love.

The art of the most skilful painter cannot so mingle and temper his colours, as exactly to imitate or counterfeit the native ones of the flowers of vegetables.
Ray. On the Creation.

If I was a philosopher, says Montaigne, I would naturalise art, instead of artifising nature. The expression is odd, but the sense is good.—Bolingbroke. Let. to Pope.

Ingenious art, with her expressive face,

Not only fills necessity's demand,
But overcharges her capacious hand

Art can never give the rules that make an art. This is, I believe, the reason why artists in general, and poets principally, have been confined in so narrow a circle.

Another vice of age, by which the rising generation may be alienated from it, is severity and censoriousness, that gives no allowance to the failings of early life, that expects artfulness from childhood, and constancy from youth, that is peremptory in every command, and inexorable to every failure.—Johnson. Rambler, No. 50.

They were plain artless men, without the least appearance of enthusiasm or credulity about them, and rather slow than forward to believe any thing extraordinary and out of the common course of nature.—Porteus, vol. i. Lect. 5.

C. Cotton. A Voyage to Ireland.

A'STROIT. Gr. Αστρον, a star. A stone sparkling like a star.

As touching astroites, manie make great account of it; and such as have written more diligently thereof, doe report, that Zoroaster has highly commended it, and told wonders thereof in art magicke.—Holland. Plinie, b. xxxvii. c. 9.

The little astroits doubtful race,
For starry rays, and pencil'd shades admir'd.
Jago. Edge Hill, b. iv.

A'STROLABE. ASTRO'LABY. Fr. Astrolabe; It. Astrolabio; Sp. Astrolabio, from Αστηρ, a star, and λαμβανειν, to take.

A flat round instrument, whereby the several motions of heavenly bodies, and the length, height, and breadth of any other thing, may be discerned and found out, (Cotgrave.)

The firste partye of this treatise shall rehearse the figures, and the membres of thine astrolaby, bycause that thou shalt haue the greater knowing of thyne owne instrument.
Chaucer. Astrolabie.

She sende for hym, and he came,
With hym his astrolabe he name;
With pointes and circles merueilous,
Whiche was of fine gold precious.—Gower. Con. A. b. vi.

And herein were the Portugals very prosperous, one of whose princes brought first into use the astrolabe, and tables of declination, with other arithmetical and astronomical rules applicable to navigation.—Evelyn. Navigation, § 29.

Liv'd Tycho now, struck with this ray which shone
More bright i' th' morn, than others beam at noon,
He'd take his astrolabe, and seek out here
What new star 'twas did gild our hemisphere.
Dryden. On the Death of Lord Hastings.

ASTRO'LOGY. ASTRO'LOGER. ASTROLO'GIAN. ASTROLO'GICK. ASTROLO'GICAL. ASTROLO'GICALLY. Fr. Astrologie; It. Astrologia; Sp. Astrologia; Lat. Astrologia; Gr. Αστρολογια, from Αστηρ, a star, and λεγειν, to speak.

Astrology appears to have been used by old writers as synonymous with astronomy. Ptolemy calls it—

The art "which teacheth by the motions, configurations, and influences of the signs, stars, and celestial planets, to prognosticate of the natural effects and mutations to come in their elements, and their inferior and elementary bodies."—Quadripartite, l. 1.

I nam but a leude compilatour of the labour of old astrologiens, and haue it translated in mine English only for thy doctrine, and with this swerd shal I slene enuy.
Chaucer. Astrolabie.

Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels; let now the astrologers, the starre ghasers, and prognosticators, stād up, and saue thee from these things that shall come upon thee.—Geneva Bible. Isaiah, xlvii. 13.

Atlas, the son of Libya, (or, as some say, the Egyptians, and as others, the Assyrians,) invented astrologie.
Holland. Plinie, b. vii. c. 56.

The above named astrologers affirmed, that a man could not possibly passe the space of 90 degrees from the ascendent, or erection of his nativities.—Id. Ib. c. 49.

It may be to good purpose, to set downe and prescribe certain rules, by the scale and square whereof astrologicall observations may be examined; that what is fruitful may be retained; what is frivolous, rejected.
Bacon. On Learning. By Wats, 1640.

Plutarch interpreta astrologically that tale of Mars and Venus.—Burton. Anat. of Melancholy, p. 443.

The Marquess of Huntly was in the king's interests; but would not join with him, though his sons did: astrology ruined him; he believed the stars, and they deceived him.
Burnet. Own Time, b. i.

But Chaucer was likewise an astrologer, as were Virgil, Horace, Persius, and Manilius.—Dryden. Pref. to Fables.

On which was written ——
Many rare pithy saws concerning,
The worth of astrologic learning.—Hudibras, pt. i. c. 3.

Since God did not make them [the stars], nor any thing else in the world, singly for themselves alone, but also to contribute to the publick good of the universe, their physical influence seeming inconsiderable, they knew not well what else could be worthy of them, unless it were to portend human events. This indeed is the best sence that can be made of astrological prognostication: but it is a business that stands upon a very weak and tottering, if not impossible, foundation.—Cudworth. Intel. System, p. 5.

More wonders typical impress the sky,
Then e'er was trac'd with astrologic eye!
Brook. Man of Law's Tale, modernized.

ASTRO'NOMY. ASTRO'NOMER. ASTRONO'MICK. ASTRONO'MICAL. ASTRONO'MICALLY. ASTRO'NOMIZE. Fr. Astronomie; It. Astronomia; Sp. Astronomia; Lat. Astronomia; Gr. Αστρονομια, from Αστηρ, a star; and Nomos, a law.

The science or knowledge of the stars or heavenly bodies.

Astronomyens al day in here art faillen
That whilen warned men byfore, what shoulde by falle after.
Piers Plouhman, p. 290.

Lo astronomyens camen fro the eest to Jerusalem. And selden, where is he that is borun kyng of the Jewis? for we han seen his sterre in the eest; and we comen for to worschipe him.—Wiclif. Math. c. 2.

With us ther was a doctour of phisike,
In all this world ne was ther non him like
To speke of phisike, and of surgerie;
For he was grounded in astronomie.
Chaucer. The Prologue.

The poets olde in their fonde fables faine,
That mightie Mars is god of warre and strife,
These astronomers thinke, where Mars doth raigne,
That all debate and discorde must be rife.
Gascoigne. Fruites of Warre.

Though there had been no political relations, this very astronomical miracle had been enough to fetch them to Jerusalem; that they might see the man, for whose sake the sun forsook his place, or the shadow forsook the sun.
Bp. Hall. Contemplations. Hezekiah sick.

Images astronomically framed under certain constellations to preserve from several inconveniences, as under the sign of the Lion the figure of a Lion made in gold, against melancholic fancies, dropsie, plague, fevers.
Id. Cases of Conscience, Dis. 3. c. 2.

And, what was ominous, that very morn
The sun was enter'd into Capricorn;
Which, by their bad astronomer's account,
That week the virgin balance shou'd remount.
Dryden. Hind & Panther.

Why should he halt at either station? why
Not forward run in unobstructive sky?
Can he not pass an astronomic line?
Or does he dread th' imaginary sign?
Blackmore. Creation, b. ii.

This was also for the sake of such as are not very conversant in astronomical matters and dimensions.
Derham. Astro-Theology, Prel. Discourse.

The old ascetick Christians found a paradise in a desert, and with little converse on earth, held a conversation in heaven: thus they astronomized in caves; and, though they beheld not the stars, had the glory of heaven before them.—Brown. Christ. Mor. ii. 9.

My opinion of astronomy has always been, that it is not the best medium through which to prove the agency of an intelligent Creator: but that this being proved, it shows, beyond all other sciences, the magnificence of his creations.
Paley. Natural Theology, c. 22.

ASTRU'CTIVE, Adstruo, Adstructum. Well opposed by Hall to Destructive.

The true method of Christian practice is first destructive, then astructive; according to the prophet, cease to do evil, learn to do good, this our Apostle observes; who first unteacheth us ill fashions, and then teacheth good.
Bp. Hall. Sermons, Rom. xii. 2.

ASTRU'T. On Strut. See Struct.

What good can the great gloton do wt his bely standing a strote like a taber, and his noll toty with drink.
Sir T. More. Workes, p. 96.

Inflated and astrut with self-conceit,
He gulps the windy diet; and ere long,
Adopting their mistake, profoundly thinks
The world was made in vain, if not for him.
Cowper. Task, b. v.

ASTU'N. See Astone.

Our Henry Hotspur next, for high achievement meet,
Who with the thund'ring noise of his swift courser's feet
Astunn'd the earth, that day, that he in Holmdon's strife
Took Douglas, with the Earle of Angus and of Fife.
Drayton. Poly-Olbion, Song 18.

—— The vain stroke from such an height,
With such a force impell'd, headlong drew down
The unwieldy champion; on the solid ground,
He fell rebounding; breathless and astunn'd,
His trunk extended lay. Somerville. Hobbinol.

ASTU'TE. Lat. Astutus, from the Gr. Αστυ, a city. As Urbanus is applied to those who have the polished manners of an inhabitant of a city (Urbs); so Astutus appears to have been applied to those who are distinguished for the subtilty and circumspection of an inhabitant of a city, (Αστυ).

The use of this word, and its sub-derivatives in ness, and ly, is, at this time, much affected.

We term those most astute which are most versute.
Sir M. Sandy. Essay, p. 168.

ASUNDER. On sunder. See SUNDER.
Separate, as particles of sand.

Me think eis a wonder, bot he salle do grete wo,
He same sched vs asonder, fro Acres salle we go.
R. Brunne, p. 174.

And til a wicked death him take Him had leuer a sondre shake
And let all his limmes a sondre riue,
Than leaue his richesse in his liue.
Chaucer. Rom. of the Rose.

Juno let bende hir partie bowe,
The skie ware darke, the wind gan blow,
The firie welkin began to thonder,
As though the world should al asonder.
Gower. Con. A. b. iii.

What kind of matrimony can that remain to be? what one duty between such can be performed as it should be from the heart, when their thoughts and spirits fly asunder as far as heaven from hell?
Milton. Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

Others acknowledge, that there is indeed moral good and evil, but they want some criterion, or mark, by the help of which they might know them asunder.
Wollaston. Religion of Nature, s. 1.

There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart:
It does not feel for man: the nat ral bond
Of brotherhood is sever'd as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire.—Cowper. Task, b. ii.

ASWE'VED. A. S. Swef-ed, Swefian, sopire, to bring asleep. See SWEVYN.

For so astonied and asweved
Was every vertue in me beried.
Chaucer. The House of Fame, b. ii. c. 4.

ASWOON. The past part. Aswond, Aswond, of the verb Swanian, Aswunan, deficere animo, (Tooke, i. 471.) But see SWOON. See the quotation from Gower in v. Astound.
In a swoon, stupor, faint, trance.

The deol that made Innogen, no tonge ne telle ne may Heo cryede and wep with sorwe ynow, and ofte yswone lay.
R. Gloucester, p. 13.

Tho shright this faucon yet more pitously
Than ever she did, and fell to ground anon,
And lith aswoune, as ded as lith a ston,
To Canace hath in hire lappe hire take,
Unto that time she gan of swoune awake:
And after that she out of swoune abraide,
Right in hire hauke leden thus she sayde.
Chaucer. The Squieres Tale, v. 10,788.

ASYLUM. Fr. Asyle; It. Asilo; Sp. Asylo; Lat. Asylum; Gr. Ασυλον. Ab, a, priv. et συλη, quod est spolium; quia, eo qui confugissent, hos spoliare non liceret, (Vossius.) Because those who fled to them were secure from harm. See the quotations.

The first asylum, some say, was built at Athens by the Heraclidæ, and was a refuge for those that fled from the oppression of their fathers: others will have this to be a sanctuary for all sorts of suppliants.
Potter. Antiquities, b. ii. c. 2.

Romulus for to increase the number of inhabitants (according to the old practice of the founders of cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obscure, feigned that they were an offspring borne out of the earth,) set up a sanctuarie or lawlesse church, called asylum.
Holland. Livius, p. 7.

Here they [foxes] bred; from hence they infested the country, and to this inaccessible asylum they retreated in the hour of alarm.—Gilpin. Tour to the Lakes.

ASYMMETRY. } From a, priv. and συμμετρος, symmetry, proportion, from συν with, and μετρον, measure. See the Geometrical usage in the examples.
ASYMMETRAL.
ASYMMETROUS.
Disproportion, irregularity.

It plainly appears what is asymmetry, or incommensurableness, viz. an enormous, disproportionate, disagreeable, excessive, or defective quantity of a thing.
Barrow. Math. Lectures, Lec. 15.

Wherefore it cannot possibly otherwise be but that the finiteness, scantiness, and imperfection of our narrow understandings, must make them assymetral or incommensurate, to that which is absolutely and infinitely perfect.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 640.

Quantities compared with respect to such a measure are by geometricians wont to be called symmetrous or asymmetrous, i. e. commensurable or incommensurable.
Barrow. Math. Lectures, Lec. 15.

A'SYMPTOTE. Comp. of Gr. α, not, συν, with, and πιπτειν, to fall.
That never falls in with, or upon: applied to lines in Geometry.

Is not the whole doctrine of asymptotical lines thus effectually overthrown;—a doctrine, indeed, wonderful, but no less certain than any other part of geometry.
Barrow. Math. Lectures, Lect. 9.

AT. This preposition is usually derived from the Latin Ad. Skinner says, At, ab; A. S. Æt, ad, apud, utr. a Lat. Ad. In our old writers we find applications of the word differing from those in modern use. Thus, in Robert of Gloucester, At stonde, and at holde; now, with-stand, and with-hold. In Chaucer, to see at eye, i. e. with eye, &c. By Wilkins it is used to denote, touching by approach the surface; in opposition to from, touching on departure the opposite edge or surface.
At may thus be said to be used to denote—
Near approach, nearness or proximity, adjunction or conjunction, association or consociation, connection, consequence.

[They] fogte and slowe much folk, for no mon hem at stod.

A'TAXY. Αταξια, from α, priv. and ταξις, order.
Disorder, irregularity.

Neither is there any ataxie to be feared in bringing in this distinction, betwixt pastors and the flock: it is an eutaxie, rather; and such, as without which, nothing could ensue, but confusion.
Bp. Hall. Epis. by Divine Right, pt. iii. § 1.

Atheologian rests upon the authority of Hayward.

It appeareth in nothing more, that atheisme is rather in the lip, than in the heart of man, than by this; that atheists will ever be talking of that their opinion, as if they fainted in it, within themselves, and would be glad to be strengthened by the consent of others: nay more, you shall have atheists strive to get disciples, as it fareth with other sects: and, which is most of all, you shall have of them that will suffer for atheisme, and not recant; whereas if they did truly thinke that there were no such thing as God, why should they trouble themselves?—Bacon. Essay. Of Atheisme.

Nor stood unmindful Abdiel to annoy
The Atheist crew, but with redoubl'd blow
Ariel and Arioch, and the violence
Of Ramiel scorcht and blasted overthrew.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. vi.

There is no knowledge, whereof God is not the author. He would never have bestowed any gift, that should lead us away from himself. It is an ignorant conceit, that enquiry into nature should make them atheistic.
Bp. Hall. Contemplations. The Sages & Star.

Nay, there are some vile things, which, through the evil discoursings and worse manners of men, are passed into an artificial and false reputation, and men are accounted wits for talking atheistically, and valiant for being murderers.
Bp. Taylor, vol. I. Ser. 2.

Lord purge and powerfully work out of all hearts that profaneness and atheisticalness, those sacrilegious thirsts and enormous violations of all that is holy.
Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 500.

This passionate love of folly, [is] improved into an habitual, steddy course of atheisticalness, a deliberate, peremptory, final reprobating of Heaven (the purity at once, and the bliss of it).—Id. Ib. vol. iv. p. 580.

If there be not devotion enough in our bosom to make God ours, in vain shall we hope to stand before our enemies. This only, whatsoever the profane heart of atheous men may imagine, this is the great ordnance, which can batter down the walls of our enemies, yea the very brack gates of hell itself.—Bp. Hall. Ser. Defeat of Cruelty.

Thy father, who is holy, wise, and pure,
Suffers the hypocrite, or atheous priest,
To tread his sacred courts, and minister
About his altar, handling holy things.
Milton. Paradise Regained, b. i.

We shall now make a diligent search and enquiry, to see if we can find any other philosophers who atheized before Democritus and Leucippus, as also what form of atheism they entertained.—Cudworth. Intell. System, p. 111.

These men were indeed the first atheizers of this ancient atomick physiology, or the inventors and broachers of the atomick atheism.—Id. Ib. Pref.

They of your society [Jesuits,] as they took their original from a soldier, so they are the only atheologians, whose heads entertain no other object but the tumult of realms; whose doctrine is nothing but confusion and bloodshed.
Hayward. Answ. to Doleman, c. 9.

Speculative atheism is unreasonable, and that upon these five accounts: 1. Because it gives no tolerable account of the existence of the world. 2. Nor does it give any reasonable account of the universal consent of mankind in this apprehension, that there is a God. 3. It requires more evidence for things than they are capable of. 4. The Atheist pretends to know that which no man can know. 5 Atheism contradicts itself.—Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 1.

The epicureans did conceit and boast, that having, by their atheistical explications of natural effects and common events here, discarded the belief and dread of religion, they had laid a strong foundation for tranquility of mind, had driven away all the causes of grief and fear, so that nothing then remained troublesome or terrible unto us.
Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 3.

After this manner, authority working in a circle, they endeavoured to atheize one another.
Bp. Berkley. The Minute Philosopher, Dial. 2.

Where England, stretch'd towards the setting sun,

A'THLETE. } Fr. Athlète; It. Athleta; Sp. ATHLE'TICK. } Athleta; Lat. Athleta; Gr. Αθλητης, from αεθλος, labour, struggle, contest.

One able to labour, struggle, contend; strong, vigorous, robust.

For athletic, I take the subject of it largely, that is to say, for any point of ability, whereunto the body of man may be brought, whether it be of activity, or of patience.
Bacon. Of Learning, b. ii.

And health itself, if it be athletic, may by its very excess become dangerous: but wisdom, and duty, and comeliness, and discipline, a good mind, and the fear of God, and doing honour to his holy name, can never exceed.
Bp. Taylor, vol. i. Ser. 9.

I shall but just mention the admirable use of our atmosphere in ministring to the enlightening of the world, by its reflecting the light of the heavenly bodies to us; and refracting the sun beams to our eye, before it ever surmounteth our horizon; by which means the day is protracted throughout the whole globe; and the long and dismal nights are shortened in the frigid zones, and day sooner approacheth them; yea the sun itself riseth in appearance (when really it is absent from them), to the great comfort of these forlorn places.—Derham. Physico-Theology, b. i. c. 1.

Holland. Plutarch, p. 495.

He that is wise, and marries, and leaves a child well educated, does make mankind his debtor, and departs a benefactor to the world: for when he is atom'd into flying dust, he has prepar'd his substitute to administer his part being gone.—Feltham. On Luke xiv. 20.

They suppose the matter of which the world is constituted, to be eternal and of itself, and then an infinite empty space for the infinite little parts of this matter (which they call atoms) to move and play in: and that these being always in motion, did after infinite trials and encounters, without any counsel or design, or without the disposal and contrivance of any wise and intelligent Being, at least by a lucky casualty, entangle and settle themselves in this beautiful and regular frame of the world which we now see.
Tillotson, vol. i. Ser. 1.

They all would vanish, and not dare appear,
Who atom-like, when their sun shined cleare,
Danc'd in his beame; but now his rayes are gone,
Of many hundred we perceive not one.
Browne. Pastorals, b. ii.

Now, I say, as Ephantus, and Archelaus, asserted the corporeal world to be made of Atoms, but yet notwithstanding held an incorporeal deity, distinct from the same, as the first principle of activity in it, so in like manner did all other antient Atomists generally before Democritus, joyn theology and incorporealism with their Atomical physiology. They did Atomize as well as he, but they did not atheise; but that atheistical Atomology was a thing first set on foot afterward by Leucippus and Democritus.
Cudworth. Intellectual System, p. 26.

These atomic theists utterly evacuate that grand argument for a God, taken from the phenomenon of the artificial frame of things, which has been so much insisted upon in all ages.—Id. Ib.

Empedocles, who was a Pythagorean also, did physiologize atomically.—Id. Ib. p. 14.

However this seems to have had its rise from nothing else but this Philosopher's not being able to understand the atomical hypothesis, which made him decline it, and substitute this spurious and counterfeit atomism of his own in the room of it.—Id. Ib. p. 16.

In this first chapter we have quite disarmed atheism of atomicism.—Id. Ib. Pref.

The Scholiast interprets Atrocem by Constantem, which favours the derivation from the Gr. Ατρεχης (from α and τρεχειν) that cannot be turned; inflexible, immovable.

Atrociously wicked, then, is inflexibly, immovably wicked; so wicked as not to be turned from wickedness; remorseless: and therefore applied to—

Iron or steel getteth an edge by the attrition of metal of the same kind.—Hall. Hard Texts, Prov. xxvii. 17.

For instance: that after the long course of a most lewd and flagitious life, a man may be reconciled to God, and have his sins forgiven at the last gasp, upon confession of them to the priest, with that imperfect degree of contrition for them, which they call attrition, together with the absolution of the priest. Now attrition is a trouble for sin, merely for fear of the punishment of it.

Som other folk sayn, that avarice is for to purchase many erthly thinges, and nothing to yeve to hem that han nede. Sothly, this avarice is a sinne that is ful damnable, for all holy writ curseth it, and speketh avenst it, for it doth wrong to Jesu Crist; for it bereveth him the love that men to him owen, and tourneth it backward avenst all reson, and maketh that the avaricious man hath more hope in his catel than in Jesu Crist, and doth more observance in keping of his tresour, than he doth in the service of Jesu Crist. And, therefore, sayth Seint Paul—That an avaricious man is the thraldome of idolatrie.

AVA'ST; when used by seamen, always precedes some orders, or some conversation. It answers the same purpose as—Harkye, list, attend, take heed, hold. Fr. Austère; It. Austero; Sp. Austèro; Lat. Austerus; Gr. Αυστηρος, which Vossius says is from Αυος, from Αυειν, siccare, to dry; applied to harsh tastes, which dry the palate. Wiclif renders the Lat. Austerus, sterne; "for thou art a sterne man;" and the Glossarist to Gawin Douglas says, Asterne, austere, fierce, Lat. Austerus. And in A. S. we find Astered, troubled, moved, provoked, stirred, (Somner.) May not austere be astere, asterne, sterne, from A. S. Stirian, Astirian, to stir, to move? An austere or austerne countenance, will then be, a stern countenance, I. e. a moved countenance, moved by some passion. And thus—

It may be of use to state distinctly, the difference between the genuineness and the authenticity of a book. A genuine book is that which was written by the person whose name it bears as the author of it. An authentic book is that which relates matters of fact, as they really happened.

Bp. Watson. Apology for the Bible, Let. 2.

The small resemblance of the portrait of Henry V. to genuine pictures of him, and the great resemblance of all the other personages to one another, make it evident that it was rather a work of command and imagination than of authenticity.—Walpole. Anecdotes of Painting, vol. i. c. 2.

I have, since the first edition of this work, authenticated two portraits of that prince [Humphry Duke of Gloucester.] Id. Ib.

Being examined on these material defects in the authenticalness of a paper, produced by them as authentick, [they] could give no sort of account how it happened to be without a signature.—Burke. Works. Report on Affairs of India.

Besides that those accounts either have, or will have, received a much stronger authentication than any that I could give to mine.—Id. Letter from Warren Hastings.

Fr. Autheur; It. Autore; Sp. Aútor. Vossius strongly contends that the Latin word should be written auctor; and inclines to adopt the opinion that it is derived from augere, auctum, extending the application of the word from one who should augment or promote any thing already undertaken or begun, to him who should himself undertake, or persuade to undertake. See AUGMENT.

Author, as a verb, is used by Chapman, and Beaum. and Fletch.—

To cause a beginning, a foundation; to found, invent, devise, create: to give credit, influence, countenance, support, power; to accredit, to countenance, to support, to empower.

If everie thing bee through God's weting, and thereof take his being, then should God bee maker and aucthour of badde werkes, and so he should not rightfully punish euill doinges of mankinde.—Chaucer. Test. of Loue, b. iii.

Now, sire, of elde, that ye repreven me;

I are a ministre of lawe and justice, and not a reuenger of other folkes malice—and by lawfull processe to punishe transgressours of the lawe, am I auctorisate.—Udal. John, c. 19.

[Themistocles] answeared the ambassadors that there should certain go with them to Lacedemon, fully authorised to entreat and conclude with the, as concerning that matter.

Above mankinde, or aught then mankinde higher,
Surpassest far my naming, how may I
Adore thee, author of this universe?
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. viii.

To quote a modern Dutch man, where I may use a classic auctor, is as if I were to justify my reputation, and I neglect all persons of note and quality that know me, and bring the testimonial of the scullion in the kitchen.
Selden. Table Talk.

——— Jove laid

Of brave friends I have authored.
Chapman. Homer. Iliad, b. ii.

Gisbert. Prince Otto slain!

Beaum. & Fletch. Rollo, or Bloody Brother, Act iii. sc. 4.

It is an excellent temper of the churche, so to prescribe her forms of absolution, as to shew them to be results of the whole priestly office, of preaching, of dispensing sacraments, of spiritual care, and authoritative deprecations.
Bp. Taylor. On Set Forms of Liturgy.

For, that, which obtaineth universally, must either have some force in itself to command acceptation, or else must be imposed by some over ruling authority; and what can that be but either of the great princes (as they are anciently called) of the church, the holy apostles; or of some general councils, as may authoritatively diffuse it through all the world?—*Bp. Authoritie usurpt, from God not giv'n.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. xii.

In some authentick writings of our church, the idolatry and superstition of the papists is censured; by idolatry, meaning the worship of images among them, and, by superstition, the worship and prayers to saints departed. A censure authorizable by that part of Saint Austin's words: Superstition is the worshipping a creature as God, or any part of a creature.—Hammond. Works, vol. i. p. 242.

See, at thy feet, Cleanthes bath'd in blood!
For love of thee he trod this lonely wood;

Barrow, vol. i. Ser. 21.

Of this sort is the apostle's creed. And its authority therefore, is, not as being a creed, but as being a true summary of apostolical doctrine, or as containing the chief heads of the doctrine of Christ delivered authoritatively in scripture.—Clarke. Expos. of the Church Catechism.

That ancient fathers thus expound the page,

AUTO'CRASY.
AUTOCRA'TICAL.
AUTOCRATO'RICAL.

Gr. Αυτοκρατεια, self-given, underived power; from αυτος and κρατεω, to be strong.

Self-created, underived strength or power.

Autocrat is now in use.

The divine will is absolute; it is its own reason: it is both the producer and the ground of all its acts. It moves not by the external impulse or inclination of objects, but determines itself by an absolute autocrasy.
South, vol. viii. Ser. 10.

And to give yet a greater instance of his sovereignty, he extends his dominion even to man's will, that great seat of freedom, that with a kind of autocrasy and supremacy within itself, commands its own actions, laughs at all compulsion, scorns restraint, and defies the bondage of human laws or external obligations.—Id. vol. viii. Ser. 1.

AUTO'MATON.
AUTOMA'TOUS.
AUTOMA'TIC.

Fr. Automate; It. Automato; Lat. Automatum; Gr. Αυτοματον.

That which has the power of spontaneous motion.

God having an understanding infinitely superior to that of man, in extent, clearness, and other excellencies, he may rationally be supposed to have framed so great and admirable an automaton as the world, and the subordinate engines comprised in it, for several ends and purposes.
Boyle. Works, vol. v. p. 251.

Clocks or automatous organs, whereby we now distinguish of time, have found no mention in any ancient writers, but are of late invention, as Pancirollus observeth.
Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. v. c. 18.

Absurd and impertinent vanity! We pronounce our fellow animals to be automates, or we allow them instinct, or we bestow graciously upon them at the utmost stretch of liberality an irrational soul, something, we know not what, but something that can claim no kindred to the human mind.—Bolingbroke. On Hum. Knowledge, Ess. 1.

The difference between an animal and automatic statue, consists in this—that, in the animal, we trace the mechanism to a certain point, and then we are stopped: either the mechanism becoming too subtile for our discernment, or something else beside the known laws of mechanism taking place: whereas, in the automaton, for the comparatively few motions of which it is capable, we trace the mechanism throughout.—Paley. Natural Theology, c. 2.

A'UTOPSY. From Αυτος and οψις.
Our own sight or vision; inspection.

In those [birds] that have forked tails, autopsy conviceth us that it [the tail] hath this use, (i. e. to turn the body to the right or left.)—Ray. On the Creation.

The Cartesian attempts to salve the motion of the heart mechanically, seem to be abundantly confuted, by autopsy and experiment, evincing the systole of the heart to be a muscular constriction, caused by some vital principle.

Brown. Vulgar Errours, b. iii. c. 4.

Such a pressure [of an ambient fluid] may hinder the avulsion of two polished superficies, one from another, in a line perpendicular to them, as in the experiment of two polished marbles.—Locke. On Hum Underst. b. ii. c 23.

That they might with joynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counsell, conduct and manage the warre: and in the mean time, with the cavellerie, with auxiliarie or aid souldiers lightly armed, represse the enemie, and stave him from spoyling so licentiously at his pleasure.—Id. Religion of Nature, s. 5.

A'ZYME. Gr. Αζυμος, without ferment, composed of α, priv. and ζυμη, ferment, (Menage.) See Azymus in Vossius.

This word appears to have been used by the translators of the Bibles published at Douay and Rhemes.

They had, (they said,) [i. e. the translators of K. James's bible], on the one side avoided the scrupulosity of the puritanes, who left the old ecclesiastical words and betook them to other, as when they put washing for baptism, and congregation for church; and on the other hand, had shunned the obscurite of the papists in their azymes, tunike, rational, holocausts, prepuce, pasche, and a number of such like, whereof their late translation was full, and that of purpose to darken the sense, that since they must needs translate the Latine, yet by the language thereof it might be kept from being understood.—Preface to King James's Bible.

B.

B, is denominated by Wilkins, a semispirituous or half-breathed consonant, a name which he applies to such as are accompanied with some kind of vocal murmur. B and P are framed when the breath is intercepted by the closure of the lips; the first of them being more soft, with some kind of murmur, the other more hard and wholly mute.

BA. The cry of a sheep. See the quotation from Chapman in v. BLEAT.

BABBLE, v. } D. Babelen; Fr. Babille; Gr. Βαβαζειν, Sw. Bredbli; from the Heb. Babel, where, says Junius, the first confusion of speech arose.
BA'BBLEMENT.
BA'BBLER.
BA'BBLISHLY.

To babble, is to talk confusedly, inarticulately; to prate idly, unreasonably, inconsiderately.

Saule knew Samuell by Samuel's owne report, and a Welch man is knowen by his tong: ergo, ministers are knowen by voyce, learning, and doctrine: is not this a proper kind of reasoning? Is this the reuerence due to the scriptures, thus bablishly to abuse them?
Whitgift. Defence, p. 282

For this blessing is geuen to all them that trust in Christe's bloud, that they thrust and hunger to do God's will. He that hath not this fayth, is but an vnprofitable hearer of faith and workes, and wotteth neither what he babbleth nor what he meaneth, or whereunto his wordes pertayne.—Tyndall. Workes, p. 66.

Sith frere Barnes I say telleth vs in effecte thys tale contrarye to some other partes of his owne tale, I wel may and will cutte of all his bibble babbel that he maketh in telling vs that the generall counsayles maye erre, because it maye be he suspecte that they haue not the spirite of God with them.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 754.

And for this cause lette your women in solemn assemblees kepe their peace, leste yf, (as that kynde is to muche geuen to babbling), there aryse an vncomly confusion.
Udal. Cor. c. 15

She had a proper wytte, and could both reade and wryte, merry in company, redy and quicke of answere, neyther nigle nor full of bable, somtyme tauntyng without displeasure, but not without disporte.—Hall. Edw. V.

Clo. Why, what would you?
Vio. Make me a willow cabine at your gate,
And call vpon my soule within the house,
Write loyall cantons of contemned loue,
And sing them lowd euen in the dead of night.
Holla your name to the reuerberate hills,
And make the babbling gossip of the aire,
Cry out Olivia.—Shakespeare. Twelfth Night, Act i. sc. 5.

(Then I do for the most part grow into hatred and contempt of learning, mock'd and deluded all this while with ragged notions and babblements, while they expected worthy and delightful knowledge.—Milton. On Education.

Be not babblers, or full of words, that is πολυλογοι, wherby the same thinge is signified, yet are not long prayers heere condemned, but those that are vayne, fond, and superstitious.
Whitgift. Defence, p. 821

When St. Paul was speaking of Christ, and his resurrection, the great Athenian philosophers looked upon all he said to be mere babbling.—Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 69.

The dazzling pomp of words does oft deceive,
And sweet persuasion wins the easy to believe.
When fools and liars labour to perswade,
Be dumb, and let the babblers vainly plead.
Rowe. Golden Verses of Pythagoras.

'Tis not the babbling of a busy world,
Where praise and censure are at random hurl'd,
Which can the meanest of my thoughts control,
Or shake one settled purpose of my soul.
Churchill. The Conference.

Though pointless satire make its weak escape,
In the dull babble of a mimic ape,
Boldly pursue where genius points the way,
Nor heed what monthly puny critics say.
Lloyd. Epistle to Churchill.

BA'BE. } A word, says Skinner, according to Menage, of Syriac origin. Skinner himself would derive it from the Italian, babbolo a babbo: but, as it is purely vox infantulis, and the infants of one country do not borrow from those of another, it needs no foreign etymology. It consists of the repetition of ba, (sc. ba ba,) the earliest, because easiest consonant uttered by children; and framed merely by the interception of the breath from the closure of the lips. Akin to it is the Gr. Παππας, papa; Heb. Ab; Syr. Abba. Udal uses the verb, to babish; and Young, the verb, to baby.

And thus hitherto that same oure heauenly souereigne lord and prince, who had for oure sakes adbeased and humbled hymselfe downe euen to swallyng cloutes, to the cradle, to crying in his swathing bandes as other children doe, and to the strengthlesse babehoode of the bodye, was preached and declared to the worlde by the onelye testymonie of other folkes talkyng.—*Udal. Drayton. The Miseries of Queen Margaret.

There Alma settled in the tongue.

BA'BOON. } Fr. Babouin; It. Babuino;
BA'BION. } D. Bavaien. From Babe, according to Skinner and Menage; because, says the former, it very greatly resembles the human race.

Asso. I am neither your minotaure, nor your centaure, nor your satyre, nor your hyæna, nor your babion, but your mere trauailer, believe me.—B. Jonson. Cynthia's Revells.

Of all the rest that most resembles man,
Was an o'erworn ill-favoured babian;
Which of all other (for that only he Was full of tricks, as they are us'd to be)
Him in her craft so seriously she taught,
As that in little time she had him brought,
That nothing could afore this ape be set,
That presently he could not counterfeit.
Drayton. The Moon-Calf.

All rules of pleasing in this one unite,
" Affect not any thing in Nature's spite."
Baboons and apes ridiculous we find;

Congreve. Of Pleasing.

BA'CCHANAL. } A follower of Bacchus.
BACCHANA'LIAN. } One devoted to the pleasures of wine.

Unto whom [Bacchus] was yearely celebrated the feast bacchanal the tenth day of the moneth Antesterion, lyke as the Ionyans, who be descéded of ye Athenián, do yet at this presēt holde it for trouth.—Nicolls. Thucydides, p. 50.

In honour of whom [Bacchus] the old bacchanalian feasts are celebrated on the twelfth day of the month Anthesterion: which custom is still retained to this day by the Ionians of Attic descent.—Smith. Ib.

Some called him Bacchus, because of the great number of shamelesse drunken bacchanalian women, which followed him with clamors and outcryes, whom he taught to gather fruits, and to presse them, whereof they made drinke, and were daily drunk.—Stow. Chronicles. Brief Abstract.

——— In halls
Carthusian fasts and fulsome bacchanals
Equally I hate. Mean's blessed. In rich men's homes
I bid kill some beasts, but no hecatombs.—Donne, Sat. 2.

Well, I could wish, that still in lordly domes
Some beasts were killed, though not whole hecatombs;
That both extremes were banish'd from their walls,
Carthusian fasts, and fulsome bacchanals.
Pope. Imit. of Donne.

Surely those who are acquainted with the hopes and fears of eternity, might think it necessary to put some restraint upon their imagination: and reflect that by echoing the songs of the ancient bacchanals, and transmitting the maxims of past debauchery, they not only prove that they want invention, but virtue.—Johnson. Rambler, No. 20.

BA'CHELOR. } Fr. Bachelier; It. Baccelliere; Sp. Bachiller; A. S. Bachelers, Baccalaurii, (Lye); but without citing any authority. Somner has not the word. Wachter suggests, that when applied to students in theology, it may be compounded of the Saxon boc, liber, biblia, and lareow, doctor: and when applied to persons of a certain military rank, he approves of the etymology of Fauchet, viz. that Bachelers are so called, quasi bas chevaliers, because they were lower in dignity than the milites bannereti; with, though behind, whom they were allowed to sit. He rejects, as destitute of authority, the opinion of Calepinus, that a chaplet of laurel berries was placed upon them, and that they were thence called Baccalaurei. The word has probably but one origin, which would account for its various applications. Kilian adopts the opinion of Ludovicus Vives, that that soldier is called Battalarius, who has once been engaged in battle (battalia); and also, in literary warfare, he is called Battalarius, who has publicly engaged in dispute upon any subject. See also Du Cange and Menage.

Bachelor is now generally applied to any man before his marriage. Ben Jonson applies it to an unmarried woman.

Yeh wol the marie wel with the thridde part of my londe,
To the noblest bacheler, that thyn herte wol to stonde.
R. Gloucester, p. 30.

Tho he ymad hym a fayr ost of this bachelerie,
He com ageyn in to this lond out of Scicie.—Id. p. 76.

With him ther was his sone, a yonge squier,
A lover, and a lusty bacheler,

Chaucer. Prologue, v. 80.

Phebus, that was flour of bachelerie,
As wel in fredom, as in chivalrie.
Id. The Manciple's Tale, v. 17,074.

And if thou were of suche lignage,
That thou to me were of parage,
And that thy father were a pere,
As he is nowe a bachilere,

Thou shuldest than be my wife.—Gower. Con. A. b. i.

Faire maide send forth thine eye, this youthful parcell
Of noble batchellors, stand at my bestowing,
Ore whom both soueraigne power, and father's voice
I haue to vse; thy franke election make,
Thou hast power to choose, and they none to forsake.
Shakespeare. All's Well, Act ii. sc. 3.

Wee doe not truste your vncle, hee would keepe you
A batchler still, by keeping of your portion
And keepe you not alone without a husband,
But in a sicknesse.—B. Jonson. The Magnetick Lady.

So thro' the whole course of his bachelorship there was never any one in the then memory of man (so I have been informed by certain seniors of that college at my first coming thereunto) that ever went beyond him [John Hales] for subtle disputations in philosophy, for his eloquent declamations and orations; as also for his exact knowledge in the Greek tongue.—Wood. Athenæ Oxon. vol. ii. p. 109.

It would not, methinks, be amiss if an old batchelor, who lives in contempt of matrimony, were obliged to give a portion to an old maid who is willing to enter into it.
Tatler, No. 261.

It must disappoint every reader's expectation, that, when at the usual time he [Swift] claimed the bachelorship of arts, he was found by the examiners too conspicuously deficient for regular admission, and obtained his degree at last by special favor; a term used in that university to denote want of merit.—Johnson. Life of Swift.

BA'CKBITE. } A word truly elegant, says
BA'CKBITER. } Skinner, and worthy to be BA'CKBITING. } compared with any of Greek composition: it signifies—

To calumniate the absent, to detract or derogate from the reputation of the absent; formed from our back and bite, q. d. to bite at the back of any one, (i. e.) when he averts his face, and presents his back.

To defame, to slander, to revile, (any one absent.)

Backbite not one another, brethrē. He that backbiteth hys brother, and he that iudgeth hys brother, backebiteth the lawe, and iudgeth the law.—Bible, 1551. Ib.

This sinne of backbiting or detracting hath certain spices, as thus: som man preiseth his neighbour by a wicked entente, for he maketh alway a wicked knotte at the last ende. alway he maketh a but at the last ende, that is digne of more blame, than is worth all the preising. The second spice is, that if a man be good, or doth or sayth a thing to good entente, the backbiter wol turne all that goodnesse up so doun to his shrewde entente.
Chaucer. The Persones Tale.

Nobles look backward, and so lose the race.
Young, Sat. 1.

The wisdom of the Roman republic in their veneration for custom, and backwardness to introduce a new law, was perhaps the cause of their long continuance, and of the virtues of which they have set the world so many examples.
Goldsmith. Essay on Custom and Law.

BAD.
BA'DLY.
BA'DNESS. } In the Goth. we find bauths, surdus, baudai, surdi: and Junius observes, that, as whatever has lost its odour or its savour is called surdum in Latin, so in the Codex Argenteus, baud is, insipidus, fatuus. Luke xiv. 34. Gabai salt baud wairthith; sic sal evanuerit, (infatuetur, Beza.) And he suggests, that from this last acceptation of the word, we may have taken our bad, malus, inutilus. (Junius, Goth. Gloss. p. 85.) That which is bad then, would be like salt which has lost its savour; i.e. of no use, unfit for any useful purpose; corrupted, spoilt. As Mad is from the A.S. Mæt-an, and Sad from A.S. Sæt-an, may not Bad be from the A.S. Beat-an, to beat: thus, beat-ed, or bated, bat'd, bad; i.e. beaten, or worsted; and then used actively? Tooke thinks it is the past part. of the verb To Bay, i.e. to vilify, to bark at, to reproach, to express abhorrence, hatred, defiance, &c. Bayed, Baed, i.e. Bay'd, Ba'd, abhorred, hated, defied, i.e. Bad. (Div. of Purley, 8vo ed.) Bad, consequentially, is—

Hurtful, injurious, destructive, mischievous, vicious, wicked, ill; worthless, depraved.

So longe hem spedde baddelicke, that hii migte as wel blinde.—R. Gloucester, p. 566.

Of sondry doutes thus they jangle and trete,
As lewd peple demen comunly
Of thinges, that ben made more subtilly,
Than they can in hir lewednesse comprehende,
They demen gladly to the badder ende.
Chaucer. The Squieres Tale, v. 10,538.

Selden or with gret peine ben causes ybrought to a good ende, whan they ben badly begonne.—Id. Tale of Melibeus.

Therefore (q.d. she) if any wight should yeue a trew sentence on soche matters, the cause of the disease maiest thou see well, vnderstande therevpon after what end it draweth, that is to sayne good or bad, so ought it to haue his fame by goodnesse, or enfame by badnesse.—Id. Test. of Loue, b. i.

For ofte tyme thei despise
The good fortune as the bad.—Gower. Con. A. b. i.

I told ye then he should prevail and speed
On his bad errand; man should be seduc't
And flatter'd out of all, believing lies
Against his Maker.—Milton. Paradise Lost, b. x.

When he [Sylla] was in his chiefest authority, he would commonly eat and drink with the most impudent jesters and scuffers, and all such rake-hells, and make profession of counterfeit mirth, and would strive with the baddest of them to give the finest mocks.—North. Plutarch, p. 386.

Thereupon puffed vp with pride, as a conquerour of publicke seruitude, he [Nero] went to the capitol, and gaue thanks to the gods, letting loose the raines to all lusts and licenciousnes of life, which before badly restrained, yet the reuerence towards his mother, such as it was, did in some sort bridle.—Greneway. Tacitus. Annales, b. xiv.

It will be a third good use of what has been discoursed, if we learn from thence, not to measure doctrines by persons, or persons by doctrines; that is, not to make one a complete rule and standard, whereby to judge of the goodness or badness of the other.—Atterbury, vol. iv. Ser. 3.

Every one must see and feel, that bad thoughts quickly ripen into bad actions; and that if the latter only are forbidden, and the former left free, all morality will soon be at an end.—Porteus, vol. i. Lect. 7.

The badness of the weather likewise, for several years past, obliges me to think of making some abatements in my rents, which I cannot possibly settle unless I am present.
Melmoth. Pliny, b. x. Let. 11.

BADGE.
BA'DGED.
BA'DGELESS. } Skinner thinks from the Dutch, Bagghe, gemma; from the Lat. Bacca; and thence also the Fr. Bague, a ring. In the A. S. we find "Beage, corona, sertum, a crown, a garland: also, Armilla, monile, a bracelet to wear on the arm or wrist; a jewell to hang about one's neck, a necklace:" perhaps, says Somner, from the A. S. Bugan, or Bygan, to bend, to curve, to bow; whence also the Bar. Lat. Bauca and Bauga, armilla; and whence, further, in Wachter's opinion, the Fr. Bague, a ring: which likewise is applied to the reward bestowed on, or prize gained by, him, that does best in any game or exercise, (Cotgrave.) Hence, then, to any—

Mark, or note, sign or ensign, of distinction.

Christ hath so lefte loue and charity for y^e badge of his christē people, that he comaudeth euery mā so largelye to loue other, that his loue shold extēd & stretch vnto his enemy.

Udal. Prologue to Eph.

Their hands and faces were all badg'd with blood,
So with their daggers, which vnwip'd, we found
Vpon their pillowes. Shakes. Macbeth, Act ii. sc. 3.

Look up, languishing soul! Lo where the faire
Badge of thy faith calls back thy care,
And bids thee ne'er forget
Thy life is one long debt
Of love to him, who on this painful tree
Paid back the flesh he took for thee.
Crashaw. The Hymn of the Holy Cross.

Had F——— a shop lyen fallow but from hence,
His doores close seal'd as in some pestilence,
Whiles his light heeles their fearfull flight can take,
To get some badg-lesse blow upon his backe!
Bp. Hall, b. iv. Sat. 5.

The great badge of our religion, the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, is so shamefully laid aside, that a great part of the kingdom never receive it at all, and very few as often as the law requires.—Beveridge, vol. i. ser. 24.

The fact is, that charity, or love to man in all its extent, being the most eminent of all the evangelical virtues, being that which Christ has made the very badge and discriminating mark of his religion, is here constituted by him the representative of all other virtues.—Porteus, vol. ii. Lect. 20.

BA'DGER, n. } Junius offers no etymology. Skinner says, perhaps, from the Dutch Back, a cheek, a jaw, q.d. backer, (i. e.) endowed with strong jaws: et est sane animal mordacissimum.

To badger, is to hunt, pursue, pester, persecute; as the badger is hunted, bayed, barked at, &c.

Hys [the apes] wyse wylye confessoure sware after vnto the Bagward, that he was weary to syt so long and heare him.—Sir T. More. Workes, p. 1183.

These being the holiest things, were to be taken down and trussed up by the priests, some of them in blue silk, some in scarlet, some in purple cloth, all in badgers' skins, and the bars and carriages to be put to them by the priests, as is prescribed.—Spelman. On Tythes, p. 84.

The fangs of a bear, and the tusks of a wild boar, do not bite worse, and make deeper gashes, than a goosequill sometimes; no not the badger himself, who is said to be so tenacious of his bite, that he will not give over his hold till he feels his teeth meet, and the bones crack.
Howell, b. ii. Let. 2.

In the case of hunting the fox or the badger, a man cannot justify breaking the soil, and digging him out of his earth for though the law warrants the hunting of such noxious animals for the public good, yet it is held that such things must be done in an ordinary and usual manner.
Blackstone. Commentaries, b. iii. c. 12.

BA'FFLE, n.
BA'FFLER. } Of unsettled etymology. Fr. Beffler, from the It. Beffare, to deceive, mock, or gull with fair words, &c.—Fr. Baffouer, to baffle, abuse, revile, disgrace, handle basely in terms, give reproachful words to. Junius thinks these French words have some affinity with the Dutch Baffen or Blaffen, to bark, (to bay,) whence also Verblaffen and Verbluffen, to baffle, to put out of countenance. In addition to the above explanations—

To baffle, is to defeat by perplexing, confusing, deceiving; to render or make useless, and ineffectual.

And furthermore, the erle bad the herauld to saye to his master, that if he for his part kept not his appointment, then he was content, that the Scottes should baffull him, which is a great reproche among the Scottes, and is vsed when a man is openly periured, and then they make of hym an image paynted reuersed, with hys heles vpwarde, with hys name, wonderyng, cryenge and blowing out of hym with hornes, in the moost dispitefull manner they can. In token that he is too be exiled the compaignie of all good creatures.
Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 5.

First, he is heard did shame, and foully shent
Then from him reft his shield, and it r'enverst,
And blotted out his armes with falshood blent,
And himselfe baffuld, and his armes vnherst,
And broke his sword in twaine, and all his armour sperst.
Spenser. Faerie Queene, b. v. c. 3.

If you get but once handsomly off, you are made ever after; for you will be free from all baffles and affronts
Howell, b. ii. Let. 14.

We may here take notice of another stratagem and policy of the devil in this, both to obscure the miracles of our Saviour Christ, and to weaken men's faith in the Messiah, and baffle the notion of it.—Cudworth. Intel. System, p. 269.

Experience, that great baffler of speculation, assures us the thing is too possible, and brings, in all ages, matter of fact to confute our speculations.—Gov. of the Tongue.

But, though the felon on his back could dare
The dreadful leap, more rational, his steed
Declin'd the death, and wheeling swiftly round,
Or e'er his hoof had press'd the crumbling verge,
Baffled his rider, sav'd against his will!
Cowper. Task, b. vi.

This Gillippus did rip the seams of every bag in the bottom where the money was, and took a good sum out of every of them: and afterwards sewed them up again, not thinking that there had been a border upon every bag upon the which was declared, the number and kinds of gold and silver that were therein.—*North. Naked, bare, stripped, or deprived (of hair, or other covering: of ornament, of value.)

BALK, v. } Skinner thinks that Balk, a beam,
Balk, n. } is from the It. Valicare, (from Varcare,) to pass over, to omit. Varcare, according to Menage, is from the Latin Varicare, to pass over, to climb over, (Varro.) See Vossius in v. Varus. But the origin of this and the preceding Balk, is still to be discovered.

To Balk may be explained—

To pass over, to omit, to neglect, to treat with neglect; and thus to disappoint, to defeat the expectation; to baffle, to puzzle: also, to do less than expected, whether wished or feared.

BA'LLAST, v. BA'LLAST, n. BA'LLASTING. } A.S. Hlæstan, Be-hlæstan, to lade, load or fraught a ship. Hence, perhaps our present Ballast, saburra. Past part. Hlæsted, Be-hlæsted, loaded or laden, (Sommer.) Dut. and Ger. Ballast. It is applied to—

Before the heart is ballasted with this fear of God, it runs after every vagrant thought that comes cross us or fleets before us; as children run after every feather that the wind drives.—Bp. Hopkins, Ser. 25.

But his [T. Coryate's] knowledge and high attainments in several languages, made him not a little ignorant of himself, he being so covetous and ambitious of praise, that he would heare and endure more of it than he could in any measure deserve; being like a ship that hath too much sail, and too little ballast—Wood. Athenæ Oxon.

I do not deny, but that a little melancholy may be sometimes as good as balast to a ship, to keep it steady; but too much is apt to sink the soul into so much grief and sorrow, that it is very difficult for it to raise up itself so high as to rejoice at all, much less in God himself
Beveridge, vol. ii. Ser. 116.

The genius of the first [Diderot] supplies the gale of favour, and the latter [Desmaretz] adds the useful ballast of stupidity.—Goldsmith. Of Polite Learning, c. 8.

Harrington. Oceana, p. 113.

Whereupon eight ballotins or pages, take eight of the boxes and go four on the one, and four on the other side of the house; and every magistrate and senator holds up a little pellet of linen, as the box passes, between his finger and his thumb, that men may see he has but one, and then puts it into the same.—Id. Ib. p. 116.

The election of the duke of Venice is one of the most intricate and curious forms in the world; consisting of ten several precedent ballotations.—Reliq. Wottonianæ, p. 260.

And, like the nation's patriots,
To find, or make, the truth by votes.

I am afraid, in process of time, it will introduce new inconveniences; as this manner of balloting. [tacitis suffragiis] seems to afford a sort of screen to injustice and partiality.
Melmoth. Pliny, b. iii. Let. 20.

BAMBO'OZLE.
BAMBO'OZLER.
BAMBO'OZLING. n.
} Not in our old lexicographers. Serenius has, to Bam, or Bamboozle, deludere; but he offers no etymology.

To delude, to mislead, to cheat, to cozen, to deceive, to beguile.

} Ger. and D. Bannen, Bann; Sw. Banna; a word of very various applications. (See Wachter, Ihre, Kilian, and Menage.) A. S. Bannan, Abannan; which Somner interprets,—to command; to publish, to proclaim; to call forth, summon, congregate, or call together. Hence also he adds, Bannes of marriage; and the Fr. Bannir; the It. Bandire; Eng. Banish. Goldast (a name of no great weight perhaps, see Bayle,) derives Bann, coactio imperantis, from Band, vinculum, from Binden, vincire. This, however, is rejected by Wachter, who asserts that from Bann, princeps, comes Bannen, to compel by imperial authority; whether by commanding, forbidding, summoning, punishing, restricting, exacting, publishing, declaring the law, or by any other means belonging to those in power. With respect to the Bannes of marriage, there appears little difficulty; to publish them, is to publish the bands, bonds, or obligations of matrimony into which the parties enter.

Tooke derives Ban (to curse), and Bane, from the verb, to Bay, thus: past part. Bayen, Bay'n, Baen, Bân. See to BAY, also BAD, base, and BAIT, (as dogs do a bear.)—See Tooke, 8vo. ed. vol. ii. p. 80. To ban, then, is (clamourously, vehemently)—

To forbid, to prohibit, to interdict, to excommunicate, to execrate, to curse. See to BANISH.

Of ye rounde table ye ban aboute he sende,
That eche a Wytesonetyd to carleon wende.
R. Gloucester, p. 187.

And contrarywise, when they sinne vnpunished, and when the rulers haue no respect vnto equitie or honestie, then God sendeth his curse among them, as hunger, dearth, moren, bannyng, pestilence, warre, oppression.

And extreme tortures of the fiery deep,
That thus have dealt with me in my distress.

But hereunto answered one of the nuns called Theano, the daughter of Menon, of the village of Agraula, saying that she was professed religious, to pray and to bless, not to curse and ban.—North. Plutarch, p. 174.

Bold deed thou hast presum'd, adventrous Eve,
And peril great provok't, who thus hath dar'd

Much more to taste it under banne to touche.
Milton. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

BANK, v. BANK, n. } Fr. Banc; It. Banco; Sp. Banco; Dan. and Dut. Banck. According to some, says Junius, from the Danish Banke, to beat, to strike, because they are constantly beaten against by the waves of the sea. Cotgrave says,—Banc, a long shole, shelf or sandy hill in the sea, against which the waves do break. Skinner is content with A. S. Banc, tumulus. Wachter has—Banc, a hill, mound, heap, and any eminent or rising place. It is transferred, he adds, to all eminent or rising places for sitting or lying. And it may thus be applied to—

Any thing raised by, or to confine, a current of water; to the seat raised from the bottom of the boat; to the raised table or counter of merchants, traders, money-changers.

To Bank, is to confine, or surround with banks; to throw up embankments. In the citation from Shakespeare, Mr. Stevens suggests, that to bank, may mean, to sail along the banks.

BA'NTERER.
BA'NTERING, n.

Not in our old lexicographers: and of unsettled etymology. May it not be a dim. of Ban, past part. of bay, to bark at? The application of the word appears to be this:—

To play upon with light and humorous raillery, mockery or ridicule,—by ascribing doubtful or excessive merits or virtues; by eliciting concealed weaknesses, lurking follies.

Where wit hath any mixture of raillery, it is but calling it banter, and the work is done. This polite word of theirs was first borrowed from the bullies in White Friars, then fell among the footmen, and at last retired to the pedants, by whom it is applied as properly to the productions of wit, as if I should apply it to sir Isaac Newton's mathematicks; but if this bantering, as they call it, be so despicable a thing, whence comes it to pass they have such a perpetual itch towards it themselves?—Swift. Tale of a Tub. Author's Apol.

I knew a lady of excellent parts, who had got past thirty without having ever had the least notice of any such thing; she was so great a stranger to it that when she heard me and another talking of it, could scarce forbear thinking we bantered her.—Locke. Conduct of the Understanding.

For those that were his [A. BA'NTLING. Infans ante nuptias, (Serenius.) A child born, or at least begotten, before the marriage of the parents. Perhaps ban-telling, or bane-telling. Now more generally applied to any infant.

But this thief did but then come to Christ, he knew Him not before; and his case was, as if a Turk or heathen should be converted to Christianity, and be baptized, and enter newly into the covenant upon his death-bed: then God pardons all his sins. And so God does to Christians when they are baptized or first give up their names to Christ by a voluntary confirmation of their baptismal vow but when they have once entred into the covenant, they must perform what they promise, and to what they are obliged.—Bp. Taylor, vol. ii. Ser. 6.

BARD. BA'RDICK. BA'RDISH. BA'RDLING. The kind of song which the Bards sung is called Barditus, by Tacitus in his Germania; and barditus is derived by Wachter from Ger. Barten, pugnare. The Bards, then, were the composers of the war song, the song of battle; and their task was martem accendere cantu, to kindle warlike courage by their song. Du Cange says, that bardire, is to send forth the cry of the stag; whence it has been supposed that Bards were so called, because they imitated the noise or bellowing of a stag.

And [the Germans] haue certaine verses, by singing of which, calling it barditus, they incourage their people, and by the same song foretell the fortune of the future battell; for they both strike a feare into others, and are themselues striken with feare, according to the measure and tune of the battell; seeming rather an harmonie of valour than voices; and do affect principally a certaine roughnes of the voice, and a broken confuse murmur, by putting their targets before their mouthes, to the end their voice by the reverberation might sound bigger and fuller.
Grenewey. Tacitus. Germanie.

Then you that valiant soules, and alaine in warre

BARD. BA'RDED. Fr. Barder; Dut. Barderen; phalerare, phaleris ornare, (Kilian.)

A word of constant occurrence in our old chronicles, and of which Mr. Steevens thinks that barb, barbed, may be no more than a corruption. Cotgrave interprets bardé, barbed; barder, to barb, or trap horses, &c. The glossarist to Gawin Douglas says, bardis, beards, manes of horses, or rather their trappings; thus making barb and bard equivalent, and of similar origin. (See BEARD.) In Chaucer (see BAR) we find "harness barred and plated," (see in v. BARM, the bosom,) "A seint barred all of silk." Upon this past tense, barred, bard, the verb, to bard, may have been formed; a bard or barded horse or harness then will be a horse or harness armed, guarded, protected. In Holland's Ammianus, Limbis ferreis cincti, is rendered, "bard about with guards of steele." Barred all of silk, may be merely striped or crossed in form of bars.

The kynges spare horse, trapped barde wise, with harneis broudered with bullion golde, curiously wroughte by golde smithes.—Hall. Hen. VIII. an. 1.

So many aries and vycuntes, that it were long to reherse; it was a great beauty to beholde the baners and standerdes wauyng in the wynde, and horses barded, and knightes and squyers richly armed.—Bernars. Froissart. Cron. vol. i. c. 41

I saw the musters of the new band men of arms, &c. some with feathers, staves, and pensils of their colours; some with sleeves and half coats; some with bards and staves, &c.—Burnet. Records, b. ii. pt. ii. A. Edw. Journal

And on both sides marched a double ranke of armed men, with targets and crested helmets, sending raies and beames from them of brandishing light, wearing upon them fine habergeons; and the men of armes here and there entermingled on bard horses, whom the Persians use to call Cibanarij, harnessed all over with good corselets, and bard about with guards of steele.—Holland. Ammianus, p. 63.

There were fifteen hundered men of armes very well mounted, and most of them barded and richly trapped after the manner of the French warres, and well accompanied with horsemen of their retinue.—Stow. Edw. IV. an. 1474

The barometer is another late instrument, very helpful to useful knowledge: that there is gravity even in the air itself, and that that element is only comparatively light, is now made evident and palpable by experience, though Aristotle and his schools held a different theory. and by the help of a quicksilver tube, the way is found to measure all the degrees of compression in the atmosphere, and to estimate exactly any accession of weight, which the air receives from winds, clouds, and vapours.—Glanvill, Ess. 3.

As to the barometrical observations (as for brevity's sake I use to call them) you guessed aright.

BASE, adj. / Base, v. / Ba'sely. / Ba'seness. } Ger. Bas, infra; Fr. Bas; It. Basso; Sp. Bazo; from the Gr. Βασις, (see Base, and Basis,) or Low Lat. Bassus, from the Gr. Βαθυς, deep. See Menage, Wachter, Skinner, and Junius, who are not at all decided.

The adj. Base, the vv. Abase, and Debase, are usually explained as if their met. applications to that which is low, and mean, were deduced from Base, the lower part, the bottom, the basis, (qv.) Tooke refers them to the English verb, to bay, (which it should seem from Skinner was also written, To bauze, or bawse,) in Fr. Abboyer, It. Abbaiare; Gr. Βοα-ειν.—The Lat. Baubari; Gr. Βαυζ-ειν, Vossius thinks are formed from the sounds Bau-bau. The Fr. Abboyer, Aboyer, Abayer, Esbahir, Abbaisser or Abaisser; It. Baiare, Abbaiare, Abbasare; the old English Bawse, Abaw, Esbay, the old and modern Bay, Abase, Abash, seem evidently to have the same origin, and same meaning, and to differ only in the respective languages, as to the manner of writing them; and in their consequential and metaphorical applications. Abase is used by Chaucer, Esbaied, by Sir Thomas Elyot, and Bawse is explained by Skinner, (exclamare, furiose intonare,) to clamour aloud, to make a furious noise. To bay, as Fr. Abayer, is to bark at, to rail loudly at, to revile extremely (Cotgrave); and thus, to express loudly, hatred, dislike, detestation, abhorrence, contempt. And hence, Base, the adj.—

Despised, despicable, disgraced, disgraceful, degraded, depressed, dejected, abject:—vile, mean, worthless, lowered, low. And To base—

To lower, to depress. See Bad, Ban, Baw, Bay.

In Shakespeare, "To base my trespass," may be to bawse it, (as Skinner writes,) to sound it clamorously.

Bacon. Nat. Hist. § 178, 179.

BASE. Of a horse, man, &c.

Base, n. applied to the caparisons of a horse, to an article of dress; to bed furniture; is so applied from its low situation; dropping, hanging down.

BASE. To play or run at bayze or bayes, says Skinner. The latter mode of writing seems introduced to sanction his etymology from Bayes, (laurus,) with which he supposes the victor to have been crowned. Bayze is near akin to Baurze, (See Bass, ante,) and may have been applied to the game, from the clamorous shouting with which it is played; or to bid base, to play at bace, to bace, may merely be—

To bid, call, or challenge to the ground (of contest); to win or maintain, by running or otherwise, the ground; to keep moving about upon one spot of ground.

The spirite of wickednesse assaileth the Lorde Jesus beyng replete with the spirite of holynesse: he biddeth bace, and beginneth firste with hym, of whom he was to be subdued: he biddeth hym come furth, who was to strong and valiaunte for hym to matche withal.—Udal. Luke, c. 4.

The first day of the challenge at base, or running, the king won.—Burnet. K. Edw. Journal, vol. ii. pt. ii.

You haue not seene yong heiffers (highly kept;
Filld ful of daisies at the field, and driuen
Home to their houels, and so spritely grown
That no roome can containe them; but about,
Brce by the dams, and let their spirits out
In crassious bleating) of more iocund plight
Than my kind friends, euen crying out with sight
Of my returne so doubted.
Chapman. Homer. Odyssey, b. x.

And ther therle and his vncle made a great assaut, and eche of them had such a stroke on the heed with stones, that their basenettes were clouen, and their heedes sore astonyed.—Berners. Froissart. Cronycle, vol. i. c. 60.

Notwithstanding at the last, the king made him put on his basenet, and then tooke a swerde with both his handes, and strongly with a good will strake him on the necke, and the same day hee made three other cittizens knights for his sake in the same place.—Stow. Richard II. an. 1381.

Barrow, vol. i. Ser 1.

Doubtless, there are men of great parts that are guilty of downright bashfulness, that by a strange hesitation and reluctance to speak, murder the finest and most elegant thoughts, and render the most lively conceptions flat and heavy.—Tatler, No. 252.

Our orators, with the most faulty bashfulness seem impressed rather with an awe of their audience than with a just respect for the truths they are about to deliver; they, of all professions seem the most bashful who have the greatest right to glory in their commission.

That sleth right as the Basilicok sleth folk by venime of his sight.—Chaucer. The Persones Tale.

BA'SIN. Fr. Bassin; It. Bacino; Sp. Bacia, Bacin; Ger. Becken, which Wachter derives from Bugen, arcuare. (A. S. Bugan, flectere, curvare, arcuare.) Menage writes thus: Vas, vasis, vasum, vacinum, bacinum, bacino. See Basenet. It is applied to—

A vessel bowed, bellied, hollowed out; to earth—any substance, so formed or shaped by surrounding masses.

To give this particular spot of ground the greater effect, they have made a very pleasing contrast; for as on one side of the walk you see this hollow basin, with its several little plantations lying so conveniently under the eye of a beholder; on the other side of it there appears a seeming mount, made up of trees rising one higher than another, in proportion as they approach the center.—Spectator, No. 477.

BA'SKET. Lat. Bascauda, taken by the Romans (Mart. 14. 99. Juv. 12. 46.) from the British Basgaud. Junius acknowledges that if bass, as applied to rushes, were a British word, basket might be supposed to have been derived from it. Basket is applied to—

Any thing interwoven with rushes and osiers, or other slight material; formed to hold or contain what may be placed in it.

BAUBE'E. As this coin bore the bust of James VI. when young, some have imagined that it received its designation, as exhibiting the figure of a baby. But the name, as well as the coin, Dr. Jamieson adds, existed before his reign. Pinkerton, however, with whose derivation Dr. Jamieson declares himself satisfied, ascribes the first use of the word to a copper coin struck in the reign of James VI. He derives it from bas-billon, the worst kind of billon. (On Medals, vol. ii. p. 109.)

And as to her false accusation of spoil, we did remit us to the conscience of Mr. Robert Richeson, master of the coining house, who from our hands received silver, gold, and mettal, as well coined as un-coined, so that with us there did not remain the value of a bawbee, or farthing.

The Glossary to the reprint of Piers Ploughman, says, that baw is still, in Lancashire, used as an interjection of contempt and abhorrence: such usage is not confined to Lancashire. Dr. Jamieson tells us, that baugh, in Scotch, means "not good." Mr. Moore, in his Suffolk Words, says "bauda is, to abuse grossly." Baw, bawda, bawse, appear to be the same word, used to express (loudly) contempt, abhorrence; feelings appropriate to that which we call bad; or (the a pronounced broad) bawd; which is formed from baugh or baw, by the addition of the termination ed,—baugh-ed or baw-ed. See Bauch, Bauchly, Bauchness, in Jamieson; and To BAY.

Bawd, then, is bad: the etymology and application support each other. Baude, joyous, according to Tyrwhitt, is riotously joyous. Baul, dirty, foul, defiled, polluted. "Ye baw, quoth on:—ye bawe, quoth a brewere," (See P. Ploughman, pp. 205, 387,) i. e. ye talk contemptibly, vilely, badly. And it admits of conjecture, that this baw may be the root of the verb to balk, q.d. to do any thing bawdly, badly; or, as the Scotch write, bauchly, not so well as hoped or expected; and, thus, to disappoint, &c.

BA'WDRICKS. The Fr. Baudrier, to dress, curry and colour the hides of kine, &c. is also explained by Cotgrave to signify,—to make belts or baudricks; and Baudrier is derived by Menage, through the medium of the Low Lat. Baldringus, from the Lat. Balteus. BAWN. Mr. Todd (Spenser's Works, vol. viii. p. 309.) observes that, "bawn is evidently used by Spenser for an eminence." In the notes on Swift's Poem, "The grand question debated, whether Hamilton's bawn should be turned into a barrack or a malthouse," it is said, that "a bawn was a place near the house, inclosed with mud or stone walls, to keep the cattle from being stolen in the night;" and that Hamilton's bawn was "a large old house." In the Goth. Bauan; Ger. Bauen; is, habitare, construere sedem ubi habites; and bauain, domicilium, occurs, Mark, v. 3, "He had his dwelling among the tombs." It appears to have been applied to—
Any habitation, dwelling, or edifice, whether constructed of stone, mud, earth, &c.

But these round hills and square bawnes, which you see so strongly trenched and thrown up, were (they say) at first ordained for the same purpose, that people might assemble themselves therein, and therefore auncietly they were called folkmotes, that is, a place of people, to meete or talke of any thing that concerned any difference betweene parties and townesfolke, which seemeth yet to me very requisite.

Spenser. View of the State of Ireland.

Thus spoke to my lady the knight full of care,

For a barrack or malthouse, we now must consider.

BAY. From the A. S. Bugan, Bygan, to bow or bend. Whether applied to any recess of the sea-shore, or in buildings, in barns or windows, it always means one and the same thing; viz. bended or curved; and is the past tense, and therefore past part. of the A. S. verb, Bygan. (See Tooke.) A bay is nothing else but a bending or curving of the shore, (Skinner.) For a similar reason the Lat. is Sinus.

BAY, n. It may be derived (says Skinner) from the Fr. Baye, a berry; and Fr. Baye, evidently from the Lat. Bacca. See the quotation from Pliny.

BE, v. }
BE'ING, n. } Sax. Beon, esse, fieri, (Lye.) Been, esse, to be, (Somner.) Sax. Ic bin; Dut. Ic ben; Ger. Ich bin, I be. The etymologists do not attempt to settle the meaning of this word. Like the Goth. Ga, the Sax. Ge, it was much used as a prefix to other words; and probably for a similar purpose; and may not this ga or ge, be from the A. S. gan, to go; and as a general term expressing motion, (without which no ideas of time or action can be received) have been intended to give force to the words to which it was so prefixed? Be may have been used as a prefix for a similar reason: the force which it has, and which seems extended to all the words borrowed to supply its tenses, viz. am, is, was, &c.; deduced from a literal meaning, at present untraced by etymologists, appears, when literally used, to be this, viz. to cause a sensation; and to be transferred metaphorically to the passions or feelings which arise within us. In A. S. as in English, the words, to which be is prefixed, are used also in their simple form, as verbs. Begyrdan, to begird; gyrdan, to gird; bethencan, to bethink; thencan, to think. In English this prefix be still appears in many instances to give emphasis to the application of the simple term: as, to bedaub; to bepraise; to besmear. And particularly when derision or contempt is intended; as, bepuddled, in Bp. Taylor; becurl, in Search; bemuffle, &c. in Sterne; beprose, in Mallett; bescutcheon, betagged, in Churchil; betailed, in Goldsmith, &c. See, in each instance, for the etymology, the word to which be is prefixed. See also AM, ARE.

What light, is light, if Siluia be not seene?
What joy is joy, if Siluia be not by?
Vnlesse it be to thinke that she is by
And feed vpon the shadow of perfection.
Except I be by Siluia in the night,
There is no musicke in the nightingale.
Vnlesse I looke on Siluia in the day,

It having pleased the most High God to reveal and represent himself to us under this name or title, he thereby suggests to us, that he would not have us apprehend him as any particular or limited Being, but as a Being in general, or the Being of all beings, who gives being to, and therefore exerciseth authority over all things in the world.

King. Oh heauen, that one might read the book of fate
And see the reuolution of the times
Make mountaines leuell, and the continent

Into the sea and other times, to see
The beachie girdle of the ocean,
Too wide for Neptune's hippes.
